The termination of this interesting scene may be easily conjectured; and the personages of the little drama are still living in prosperity and happiness at Hanover, where the Countess Adelheid still retains the name of "the Invisible Girl."

COMMERCE OF THE JEWS.

From the Family Library.

It appears from all historical data, that, during the reign of Solomon, almost all the commerce of the world passed into his territories. The treaty with Tyre was of the utmost importance: nor is there any instance in which two neighbouring nations so clearly saw, and so steadily pursued, without jealousy or mistrust, their mutual and inseparable interests. On one occasion only, when Solomon presented to Hiram twenty inland cities which he had conquered, Hiram expressed great dissatisfaction, and called the territory by the opprobrious name of Cabul. The Tyrian had, perhaps, cast a wistful eye on the noble bay and harbour of Acco, or Ptolemais, which the prudent Hebrew either would not, or could not—since it was part of the promised land—dissever from his dominions. So strict was the confederacy, that Tyre may be considered the port of Palestine, Palestine the granary of Tyre. Tyre furnished the ship-builders and mariners; the fruitful plains of Palestine victualled the fleets, and supplied the manufacturers and merchants of the Phœnician league with all the necessaries of life. This league comprehended Tyre, Aradus, Sidon, perhaps Tripolis, Byblus, and Berytus; the narrow slip of territory which belonged to these states was barren, rocky, and unproductive. The first branch of commerce into which this enterprising people either admitted the Jews as regular partners, or at least permitted them to share its advantages, was the traffick of the Mediterranean. To every part of that sea the Phœnicians had pursued their discoveries; they had planted colonies and worked the mines. This was the trade to Tarshish, so celebrated, that ships of Tarshish seem to have become the common name for large merchant vessels.

Tarshish was, probably, a name as indefinite as the West Indies in early European navigation; properly speaking, it was the south of Spain, then rich in mines of gold and silver, the Peru of Tyrian adventure. Whether or not as early as the days of Solomon,—without doubt in the more flourishing period of Phœnicia, before the city on the mainland was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and insular Tyre became the emporium, the Phœnician natives extended their voyages beyond the pillars of Hercules, where they founded Cadiz. Northward they sailed along the coast of France to the British isles; southward along the African shore, where the boundaries of their navigation are quite uncertain, yet, probably, extended to the Gold Coast. The second branch of commerce was the inland trade with Egypt. This was carried on entirely by the Jews. Egypt supplied horses in vast numbers, and linen yarn. The valleys of the Nile produced flax in abundance; and the yarn according to the description of the prudent housewife in the Proverbs, was spun and woven by the females in Palestine. The third, and more important branch, was the maritime trade in the Red Sea. The conquests of David had already made the Jews masters of the eastern branch of this gulf. Solomon built or improved the towns and ports of Elath and Eziongeber. Hence a fleet manned by Tyrians, sailed for Ophir, their East Indies, as Tarshish was their west. They sailed along the eastern coast of Africa, in some parts of which the real Ophir was, probably situated. When the Egyptians under Necho, after the declension of the Israelitish kingdom, took possession of this branch of commerce, there seems little reason to doubt the plain and consistent account of Herodotus, that the Tyrians sailed round the continent of Africa. The whole maritime commerce, with eastern Asia, the southern shores of the Arabian peninsula, the coasts of the Persian gulf, and, without doubt, some parts of India, entered, in the same manner, the Red Sea, and was brought to Elath and Eziongeber.

Yet even this line of commerce was scarcely more valuable than the inland trade of the Arabian peninsula. This was carried on by the caravans of the native tribes, who transported on camels the spices, the incense, the gold, the precious stones, the valuable woods, particularly the almug, thought to be the sandal, and all the other highly-prized productions of that country; perhaps all the foreign commodities which were transported across the Persian gulf, or which were landed, by less adventurous traders from the east, in the Arabian ports on that sea. Both these lines of commerce flowed directly into the dominions of Solomon. Those goods which passed on to Tyre were, not improbably, shipped at Joppa. Two of the towns which Solomon built, Gezer and lower Bethoron, were nearly on the line from the Red Sea to that haven. This traffick was afterwards recovered by the Edomites, under the protection, or sharing its advantages with the Egyptians; still, however, the Tyrians were most likely both the merchants who fitted out the enterprises and the mariners who manned the ships. The goods intended for Tyre were then, most probably, shipped at Rhinocorura. Under the Romans the Nabathean Arabs carried on the same traffick, of which their great city, Petra, was the inland emporium; at least that by the caravans, for the Ptolemies had diverted great part of the Red Sea trade to their new port of Berenice. A fifth line of commerce was that of inland Asia, which crossed from Assyria and Babylonia to Tyre. In order to secure and participate in this branch of traffick, Solomon subdued part of the Syrian tribes, and built two cities, as stations, between the Euphrates and the coast. These were Tadmor and Baalath, one the celebrated Palmyra, and the other Baalbec. After the desolating conquests of Assyria, and the total ruin of old Tyre, this line of trade, probably, found its way to Sardis, and contributed to the splendour of Croesus and his Lydian kingdom. It was from these various sources of wealth that the precious metals and all other valuable commodities were in such abundance, that, in the figurative language of the sacred historian, "silver was in Jerusalem as stones, and cedar-trees as sycamores."

THE COUNTRY GIRL.

FROM THE FRENCH.

She was but sixteen years of age. Her long black eye lashes shadowed the finest eyes in the world; a plain gingham frock encumbered her form, and simplicity ornamented her comely corsage. She was observed by the blighting eye of man—the eloquence of love fell upon her, and she blushed a consent.

A year, and her destiny was changed! She forsook her native village, her old father, and exchanged her modest dress for the gorgeous trappings of fashion. Balls and theatres were familiar to her, and he who had first caused her heart to palpitate, was remote from her thought.

Fortune continued to smile upon her—the most splendid dresses adorned her person, and the greatest luxuries could scarcely satisfy her extravagance. Wealth, diplomacy and elegance, contribute to embellish her magnificent palace. In the centre of fashion, she was the great attraction; she was waited for, and her arrival was the signal for pleasure. Yet, not one glance did she give to the past; but sought forgetfulness. Her family, the companions of her childhood, her native place, all were forgotten in the giddy vortex of dissipation. Pleasure was all she sought!

One evening, after a sumptuous dinner, she recollected that on that very night a new opera was to be performed; a prima donna of great reputation was to sing. "All Paris will resort thither," said she, "it is only ten o'clock, and I can get there in time—no matter for the play or the singer! To show myself, if it's only for a minute is all I desire."

She called for her horses, and giving orders to the driver to put them to speed, departed.

At the corner of a street a poor old man who was labouring to get to his lodgings was overthrown by the splendid equipage. The cries of the unfortunate wretch brought the mob around him; they seized the reins of the horses and raised the wounded man from the ground. The spark of life still lingered, the clamour of the populace arose to its highest degree, and a thousand imprecations were heard.

"A few pieces of gold will doubtless silence this tumult," said she, lowering the glass and looking out upon the crowd. At that moment the old man uttered a last groan, and expired! A glare of light from one of the lamps fell upon his blood-stained visage—she recognised the features—it was her father!

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1829.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume

☞ The "Appeal" published in our masonick department to-day, is signed by ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY of the most respectable citizens of Vermont. Among them are the Governor of the state (re-elected at the last election), the speaker of the House of Assembly, and many other distinguished individuals. What will the proscriptionists say now—are all these gentlemen "liars" and "cut-throats"?

ANTI-MASONICK ADDRESS. The National Observer of yesterday contains an address to the "free electors of the county of Albany," set forth in flaming type, and signed by twenty anti-masons—being four less than attended the celebration on the eleventh of September. The remaining four, together with a new convert, are candidates for offices. The "free electors" of the county will probably vote just as they would if this "address" had not been published or thought of; some of its charges, however, are so truly anti-masonick, and presuppose such an enormous gullibility in the reader, that we shall present a few passages of it, as much as curiosities, as to offer a few remarks thereon. The authors of this address have as much right as other political scribblers, to put forth sound for substance, on the eve of an election; but they make an unreasonable draft upon the charity of the community, when they pretend to advance the following with good motives:

"But in the presence of masonry, these [political] distinctions are as nothing; for masonry usurps all authority;—claims the control of every branch of public and private affairs, and leaves to the mass of the people nothing but submission and degradation."

These shallow and stale charges eke out the second paragraph. There is not a word, either before or after, advanced by way of proof. To make the charge seems to have been all that was considered worthy of attention by the truth-loving inquisitors. To deceive the honest electors of the county, if possible, was the object; and so long as a vote might be gained, it was a matter of indifference to them whether it were gained by fair or by foul means. Their allegations are contradicted by every man's experience. No one who values his character for veracity, can say that masonry ever "usurped" any "authority;" or ever exercised any, except for the good of mankind, and where it has a legitimate right to exercise it, within the walls of a lodge, and over the hearts of its disciples, to soften their asperities and enforce good works. It is equally true and equally incontrovertible, that masonry does not, and never did "claim the control" of any "branch of public" or "private affairs." The assertion to the contrary is made in the face of truth, and could emanate only from a corrupt heart and determined malignity. The people of this country never did and never will "submit" to any thing but laws of their own making; and the hint at their degradation will call forth their smiles for its folly, and their contempt for its arrogance. The next paragraph is as follows:

"Whence comes that tremendous power which dared to stand forth in the face of a people called free, and insult them with the rating of chains? Are masons elected as such by the people? Do they render an account of their administration? Are their suits and deliberations in public? Is the press free to discuss their merits? And yet this same masonry has openly boasted that it controls the Legislature, the Executive Desk, the enterprises of Government, and business transactions of mankind; that it fears nothing from public or private violence, and as every means to counteract opposition, to defeat and to punish it. These boasts have been true: facts have justified them, and they will become more verified in the extinction of our liberties, unless we make and defend ourselves."

It is a question whether the first sentence of the above paragraph is to be taken as seriously meaning something, or merely as an evidence of the author's rhetorical ability. "That tremendous power" is probably intended to signify what would be expressed in plain prose by the word "masonry;" and, as we never before heard that the institution was in the habit of "rattling chains" "in the face of" any "people," whether or not "called free," we must dismiss the sentence as containing a wonderful discovery, or as being a poetical feat, a la patriot Phelps. As to the subsequent questions, no one contends that "masons are elected as such by the people"; and they as much "render and account of their administration," and as much "sit and deliberate in public," as ecclesiastical synods, or literary and scientific societies. Their festivals are celebrated "in public," their orations and addresses are delivered "in public;" their constitutions, rules and regulations are printed and open to the inspection of all; and every year are the proceedings of the parent bodies published, and he who likes may read them. Societies as well as individuals, have private transactions in which none but themselves are interested, and they undoubtedly have a right to be silent "in public" with respect to these transactions. It is unmanly to meddle with them; and it is unjust to interpret them so as to favour the interests of office seekers, or gratify the prejudices of the multitude. The argument intended to be urged by these questions, might be urged with equal propriety against the members of every family, of every religious body, and of all societies which do or ever did exist. It is a new system of morals to say, that because men do not trumpet their private affairs to the world, they are necessarily vicious. Besides, this noisy fear of secrecy does not seem honest in men, one of whom, at least, is a member of the Phi Beta Kappa society, and all of whom are supporters of others, who still adhere to the Washington Benevolent Society.

The question relative to the press can have but one answer, and that is a plain affirmative. The moanings of their favourite vehicle in this city should ere this have convinced the twenty sponsors of the question, that this community at least know how to distinguish between freedom and licentiousness. If it be freedom to call every honest man who differs with you in opinion, a "murderer," a "kidnapper," a "wretch," a "perjured scoundrel," and the like, then is the National Observer the only free paper in the city; and if it be proper to fill a sheet twice a week with matter which can not instruct, but only insult and irritate the reader, then is the National Observer a marvellous proper paper. But we think that every man who respects the peace and character of society, will deprecate the extension of such "freedom" and such "propriety."

The penultimate sentence was evidently invented to support the last, and contains as many falsehoods as could conveniently be expressed by the same number of words. It is not true that masonry boasts of such control; on the contrary, she disclaims even the desire to exercise it.

The address abounds in charges of an equally wholesale and groundless character. But it would be useless to refute them. Not a fact is advanced to support a single allegation. Not an overt act of masonry is specified. The people are required to take for granted every thing advanced. They must not question any thing—the ipse dixit of the twenty signers must be considered the standard of right—like the king, it can do no wrong. It is not astonishing that an election should produce such fruits, but it is astonishing that, for the unworthy and unholy purpose of nourishing unwarrantable and degrading excitement, men of respectable standing in the community should allow their names to be attached to such an instrument.

The libellous statement which originated in the Anti-masonick Enquirer, having been extensively copied into other journals of the same abandoned character, we have deemed it proper to publish the following refutation of general Gould. We'd charge was, in substance, that general Gould had received from the Grand Chapter of this state, "a large sum" of money, to be expended for the benefit of those implicated in the Morgan transactions. When this charge was originally made, general Gould denied its truth plainly and promptly; but the truth was not what Weed sought after, and accordingly he reiterated his allegations. The following is a subsequent denial by general Gould; and it will be seen that the affair is to be made a subject of legal investigation.

To the Editors of the Rochester Daily Advertiser:

Gentlemen—It is a sad thing to be engaged in newspaper controversy, but it is more painful, so when we find ourselves compelled, from the force of circumstances, to enter the lists with "men wearing purple and an iron crown," on whose days, from their infancy upward, have been the traditions and sayings the characters of their noble and beneficent, and whose nights have been occupied in a sacred and virtuous mind with horror and disgust.

I should not have again troubled the public with any communication of mine, but for the continued abuse, in this particular case, of the names of the Anti-Masonick Enquirer. The statements published in that abusive print, I have already pronounced untrue, and I am now, in addition, authorized by Mr. Van Vleet, of Albany to say, that the conversation mentioned in the Enquirer, which is said to have taken place at the Eagle Tavern in June '43, in relation to myself, so far as he is concerned, is absolutely false. The statement, also, that I paid fifty dollars, or any other sum, to get Mrs. Monroe, or any other person, from Canada, or the assistance that I ever paid one cent to aid any one concerned in the abduction of Morgan, to get them clear of punishment, or for any other purpose, is also false. I have commenced a prosecution against the Editors of the Enquirer, and here I shall rest, unless some more moral and virtuous person than Thaddeus Weed shall see fit to become my accuser.

It gives us pleasure to learn from the first number of the new series of the Vermont Advocate, that a portion of the columns of that very respectable republican journal will in future be devoted to a defence of the masonick institution, and an investigation of the present proscriptive excitement. The editor makes this announcement in a well written essay, from which we extract the following paragraph.

"Knowing the present excitement on these subjects [masonry and anti-masonry] to exist without just cause, as it relates to the institution of masonry, the fraternity have hitherto avoided a discussion of its merits, not however from a consciousness that the principles of masonry were not capable of being defended, or a want of ability to defend them, but from a belief that the good use of the community was sufficient to counteract the effects intended to be produced by it. But emboldened by the passive manner in which their attacks have been received, the leaders of the anti-masonick party have assumed to invent and propagate the foulest calumny with such brazen faced effrontery, as to confound the most impartial inquirer after truth, and unhinge the judgement of very many of the honest and well meaning in the community, who have no means at hand to detect the imposition. All this contumely might be borne in the true spirit of masonick forbearance, by the members of the institution, were it not that their constitutional rights are assailed, and a participation in the common privileges of citizens attempted to be wrested from them; but since such is the fact, forbearance is no longer a virtue—by practicing it, they are no longer just to themselves or the community. The attack has been made and continued by means of the press, and through the same means it is right it should be repelled. Relying therefore on the aid and support of the fraternity, as well as every honest inquirer after truth and lover of peace and harmony in the community, it is the purpose of the editor fearlessly, but temperately, and with the strictest regard to truth, to meet the enemies of masonry 'face to face,' in matters of fact, assertion, or inference; and by exhibiting the principles and objects of the institution in its true light, expose the false colouring and sophistical reasoning by which defaming demagogues are seeking to prejudice the public mind and create and perpetuate an excited state of feeling, favourable only to the successful prosecution of schemes for their individual aggrandizement, at the expense of the quiet, as well as the general interests of the community."

We cut the following resolution (passed at a republican meeting recently held in Ulster county), from an anti-masonick paper, in which it is accompanied by the grumbling of a little squad of inquisitionists, who met to deliberate upon the prospect they have of disfranchising the masonick fraternity. The antis become exceeding wrathful when the honest yeomanry question their proscriptive policy; and comments upon their "malicious spirit" are not to be endured. Now, what is there in the following resolution obnoxious to the feelings of an honest man? Will a real friend to "equal rights," for which these antis assume to contend, fear a determination on the part of the people to "discountenance proscription"? Certainly not. The sham fellows who found fault with the following resolution, would find fault with any thing, not "whole hog" enough to hang up half the community for their especial benefit.

"Resolved, that we discountenance the malicious spirit of anti-masonry, and believe it calculated to create strife, create personal animosity, array neighbour against neighbour, brother against brother, and to destroy the ties of friendship and good feeling in the community, and that we will continue to discountenance all proscription whatever of any denomination of men, civil or religious."

It is very natural that the men who opposed their country, and exerted every faculty to paralyze its efforts during the troublesome period of the last war, should now be found among the most active and noisy of the inquisitionists. The proscriptive and anti-republican doctrines of anti-masonry strictly accord with their professions through life; and as they were found sufficiently reckless and depraved, when the honour and liberties of their country were at stake, to barter its liberties for private gain, it should not astonish any one to see them, in time of peace, zealous and clamorous in advancing their measures of personal aggrandizement at the cost of the public prosperity. They seem to have been born enemies to justice and the republican institutions of their native land; and certainly we have abundance of evidence that the political school in which they were educated was too friendly to their natural selfishness and love of anarchy to soften or eradicate them. We must not expect that such men will be either idle or honest; and it is a circumstance peculiarly characteristic of anti-masonry, that they are universally its supporters. John Cray, an anti-masonick candidate for senator, and who, in derision, has been called "the honest," was president of the Washington Benevolent society, of Washington county, and the Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong, who recently published three or four columns of caunting philippics against masonry, was chaplain of the same immaculate collection of choice spirits!

THE JOURNAL OF HEALTH, published at Philadelphia semi-monthly, for $1 25 a year, deserves to be extensively patronized. The members and friends of Temperance societies would undoubtedly forward their own objects, by extending its circulation.

THE ALBANY THEATRE, which, during the present recess, has undergone a thorough repair, and been tastefully embellished by approved artists, will be opened on Thursday next. The industry, zeal, and liberality of the managers, are worthy of encouragement, and we doubt not they will be met by a corresponding spirit.

FRANCES WRIGHT has lectured, the present week, at Utica, to large and respectable audiences. She is next expected at Syracuse.

A sovereign remedy against Anti-Masonick Electioneering. At this time when political Anti-Masons are all running about, to electioneer their neighbors; it may be a kindness to those who are likely to be thus elected, to apprize them of a remedy—especially one which is safe, easily administered, and certain in its effect. It is this; Here y ask the Anti-Mason what he is in politics? What he was a few months since? Why he "turned his coat"! How often he has been disappointed in the pursuit of office? And whether he ever before felt, or looked as contemptible as he does, in attempting to make political Anti-masons out of honest men? These questions properly administered—so as to be understood, and in a manner to require an answer, have hitherto never failed, and probably never will fail, to relieve any person who is best by an Anti-Mason, from all further trouble or importunity from that quarter. Q. M. Corner. [Onida Observer.]

Anti-Masonick Justice. A man by the name of Kavanaugh, and the celebrated Fred Whittlesey, one of the Morgan committee, were recently tried at Rochester by an anti-masonick court; each for an assault and battery. Kavanaugh, who is not an anti-mason, was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of 50 dollars, and be imprisoned for 30 days in the county jail. Whittlesey, who is an anti-mason, and one of the worst kind, was also found guilty, and what was his punishment? He was fined 10 dollars, and no imprisonment! "When the wicked reign, the people mourn." [Mason Observer.]

The anti-masons have been much alarmed for the liberties of our country, because the masonick order make use of certain "titles," and their "knights, princes and kings" have disturbed their imagination more than the witches did the good people of old Salem. But now mark the change! Look at their handbills! These "plains," "republican and masons" style their man Hiram A. "Dector," "Pool and Whitmore," "Esquires," and the plain, simple Mr. Bancroft, the "Honourable Edward Bancroft"! These ants are queer folks. [Id.]

An Anti-Mason. If in your walks you meet a man who in bar-rooms, at the corners of the street, in every walk of life, is loud and boisterous against the fraternity of freemasons—it he accuse every individual of bloody thoughts, of murder and of outrage, and wish their halts desecrated, their names made infamous, and their lives sealed up—Reader, you not only see an anti-mason, but one who, if the truth were known, in nine instances out of ten, has made repeated trials to gain admission to the society, and been rejected. The most virulent of the anti-masonick party, will almost invariably be found to be rejected applicants. [Roch. Craftsman.]

At the annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of this State, just held at Montpelier, it was resolved that the members wear the usual badge of mourning, as a testimony of the respect entertained for the character and services of the late Col. JOHN CHIPMAN, our venerable and esteemed townsman. [Vermont American.]

From the Oneida Observer.

"Republican Anti-Masons," sounds very like "Mahometan Christians," "honest villains," "respectable pickpockets," "patriotic traitors," and if it would add to the gratification of those who are seeking by such miserable perversion of language, to gain the favour of the people, we might extend the comparison. Over and over again have political anti-masons disclaimed all connexion with the Republican party, and it is but a few days since that, at one of their meetings in Albany, they passed a resolution that the Republican party became extinct long before the death of Jefferson. These pretended new lights, or more properly blue-lights, in politics, were at one time exceedingly anxious the publick should believe that no connexion existed between them and either of the two existing parties. They professed the greatest dread of the contamination which such an intimacy would produce—they were the real immaculates—Solomon Southwick, Fred Whittlesey, Giddings, and all; and they meant to enjoy the profits of the whole concern; but no sooner was it promulgated that the chief managers were distinguished for their hatred and opposition to democracy, than the cry was raised—"We are Republican anti-masons." It was really a good joke to hear these fellows calling themselves Republicans. If Cromwell was a finished hypocrite, we'll lay a wager that, were he now among us, and seeing himself so infinitely surpassed "in sugaring o'er the devil's self with Virtue's visage," by these new aspirants after fame, he would "hang his head and blush to think himself a man."

ANTI-MASONRY cannot be Republicanism, because it denies the enjoyment of equal rights to all. It cannot be Republicanism, because it assumes to take cognizance of men's consciences, and seeks, by inflicting punishments of political disabilities, to prevent the free enjoyment of opinion. It cannot be Republicanism, because it is hostile to the principles of our government, which sanction no religious tests, but which place on a perfect equality the different denominations of Christians, and only require from those who direct its affairs, "honesty, capacity, and fidelity to the constitution."

We must not omit to record an incident, which occurred during the session of the recent Convention at Van Wagenen's. When the chairman of the select committee, appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the sense of the convention, had read the 4th, a veteran of the Revolution rose in his place and exclaimed, "I am one of them—I have been an anti-mason, but I have seen my error and recanted." This frank confession, so unexpected and appropriate, drew forth loud applause. [Ulster Sentinel.]

WEBSTER'S SPELLING BOOK. A meeting of Teachers having convened in R. Luckwood's School Room, corner of Bondway and Reed street, on 31st of July last, and continued by adjournment to the 2d inst., for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of adopting Dr. Webster's Elementary Spelling Book, compiled by the late Aaron Ely, and recently published in this city; and the work having been carefully and critically examined at these several meetings, and its claims to publick patronage, when compared to similar publications, as well as several other points in favour of this work, as set forth in a report made by a committee composed of its friends, having been discussed at great length, the report of the committee was, on the final question being taken, rejected by a large majority, only six Teachers voting in favour of its adoption. ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED. The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgment for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the publick to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the publick, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the sucking. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding-house keepers—in masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 183 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy. POETRY.

TO A SKYLARK.

BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

Hail to thee, blithe spirit!
 Bird thou never wert,
 That from heaven, or near it,
 Pour'st thy full heart
 In profuse strain of unpremeditated art.
 Higher still and higher
 From the earth thou springest
 Like a cloud of fire;
 The blue deep thou wingest,
 And singing still dost soar, and soaring ever singest.
 In the golden lightning,
 Of the sunken sun,
 O'er which clouds are brightning,
 Thou dost float and run;
 Like an unbodied joy whose race is just begun.
 The pale purple even Melts around thy flight;
 Like a star of heaven,
 In the broad daylight
 Thou art unseen, but yet I hear thy shrill delight,—
 Keen as are the arrows
 Of that silver sphere,
 Whose intense lamp narrows
 In the white dawn clear,
 Until we hardly see, we feel that it is there.
 All the earth and air
 With thy voice is loud,
 As, when night is bare,
 From one lonely cloud
 The moon rains out her beams, and heaven is overflowed.
 What thou art we know not;
 What is most like thee?
 From rainbow clouds there flow not
 Drops so bright to see,
 As from thy presence showers a rain of melody.
 Like a poet hidden
 In the light of thought,
 Singing hymns unbidden,
 Till the world is wrought
 To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded not:
 Like a high-born maiden
 In a palace tower,
 Soothing her love-laden
 Soul in secret hour
 With musick sweet as love, which overflows her bower:
 Like a glow worm golden
 In a dell of dew,
 Scattering unobtruded
 Its aerial hue
 Among the flowers and grass, which screen it from the view;
 Like a rose embowered
 In its own green leaves,
 By warm winds deflowered,
 Till the scent it gives Makes faint with too much sweet these heavy-winged thieves;
 Sound of vernal showers
 On the twinkling grass,
 Rain-awakened flowers,
 All that ever was
 Joyous, and clear, and fresh, thy musick doth surpass:
 Teach us, sprite or bird,
 What sweet thoughts are thine:
 I have never heard,
 Praise of love or wine
 That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine.
 Chorus Hymenæal,
 Or triumphal chant,
 Matched with thine would be all
 But an empty vaunt,
 A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want.
 What objects are the fountains
 Of thy happy strain?
 What fields, or waves, or mountains?
 What shapes of sky or plain?
 What love of thine own kind? what ignorance of pain?
 With thy clear keen joyance
 Languor can not be.
 Shadow of annoyance
 Never came near thee:
 Thou lovest; but ne'er knew love's sad satiety.
 Waking or asleep,
 Thou of death must deem Things more true and deep
 Than we mortals dream,
 Or how could thy notes flow in such a crystal stream?

We look before and after,
 And pine for what is not;
 Our sincerest laughter
 With some pain is fraught;
 Our sweetest songs are those that tell the saddest thought.
 Yet if we could scorn
 Hate, and pride, and fear;
 If we were things born
 Not to shed a tear,
 I know not how thy joy we ever should come near.
 Better than all measures
 Of delightful sound,
 Better than all treasures
 That in books are found,
 Thy skill to poet were, thou scorner of the ground!
 Teach me half the gladness
 That thy brain must know,
 Such harmonious madness
 From my lips would flow.
 The world should listen then, as I am listening now.

THE EVENING STAR.

Shine on—shine on, thou pure, pale star—
 Thy race is but begun.
 Yet often peace has changed to war,
 And tears have tracked the victor's car,
 Since first thy course was run.
 And yet thou shinest calm and bright,
 At early evening hour,
 As if thy soothing, tranquil light,
 Had only lingered, night by night
 Upon some gentle flower.
 But streaming eyes have gazed on thee,
 Which now are dull and cold—
 And hearts have bounded, light and free,
 And songs have echoed merrily,
 Beneath thy beams of old.
 And thou hast guarded peaceful sleep—
 And poured thy gentle ray,
 Where stern Enthusiasts, vigil keep;
 Where Sorrow shrinks away to weep,
 Or Misery, to pray.
 And thus thou shinest, year by year
 Upon this world of change.
 On childhood's smile, on age's tear,
 On youth, on manhood—on the bier,
 E'en in thy narrow range.
 So I must gaze, as others have,
 Upon thy joyous face,
 Until Time's never tiring wave,
 Shall heave its swell above my grave—
 Last refuge of our race.
 Yet thou shalt have thy time of doom,
 Thine hour to pass away;
 Thy brightness shall be wrapt in gloom;—
 The shades of an eternal tomb,
 Shall darken thy decay.
 Thou shalt be blotted from thy sphere,
 Without or fade, or wain—
 For thee will stream no bitter tear,
 Alone, must thou the "fiat" hear—
 "Never arise again."
 But I shall burst the bonds of death—
 The fetters of decay—
 Shall wear a purer, brighter wreath,
 Than ever felt the zephyr's breath,
 Or smiled beneath thy ray.

A 5

From the Ladies' Magazine, for October.

TO A PALM LEAF,

Gathered from a tree that shades the grave of Paul and Virginia, in the Isle of France.
 I've looked on thee, wan leaf,
 Till thou dost seem the messenger of fear,
 And my heart thrills as grief,
 Deep, certain, terrible, were hovering near.
 I see the gathering storm,
 Darkness, and whirlwind, and the roaring main,—
 And now a fair, young form
 Beseeching heaven for aid—it is in vain!
 She rests, that lovely maid,
 Wan leaf, she rests beneath thy parent tree,
 And in that hallowed shade,
 Her heart-struck lover slumbers peacefully.
 They need not glory's wreath,
 To keep their memory from the blight of years,
 A leaf can speak their death,
 And from the full soul wring a gush of tears.

But autumn winds will rise,
 And scatter far our forests' waving glory,
 Yet not a leaf that flies,
 Will whisper to the heart this moving story.

For nature hath no tongue
 Till Genius breathes upon the slumbering mass;
 Till Genius' light is flung,
 We heed no shadows beckoning as they pass.

But all is still and dark,
 And men may die unheeded as the rain
 Falls round the gliding bark
 Urging her rapid course athwart the main.

Yes, more—the cherished worth
 Of all men strive for in their earthly race,
 Fades with their names from earth,
 If Genius smile not on their dwelling-place.

Then Genius, with the free
 Come dwell—our broad land with thy presence fill,
 Till mountain, stream and tree,
 Shall have a spell to move, a voice to thrill.

THE MINSTREL.

BY V. V. ELLIS.

Low on the solemn bier!
 The laurel is a gloomy mockery now—
 While they who gloried in its wearer, bow
 In grief, and shed the tear.
 Hushed is the glowing strain;
 The lip is pale that burned with love and pride;
 And thought, which flowed in such a living tide,
 Never may wake again.

Visions of earth and sky,
 Of sounding seas, and infinite unknown,
 The empire of the intellect and throne,
 Gleamed on his mental eye.
 He read with wizard skill,
 The passions of our nature; pity, love,
 Hatred, joy, sorrow, madness; and could move
 Their energies at will.

In glorious Italy,
 And rich gardens, and proud marble halls,
 Where shapes of beauty breathe along the walls,
 Beneath a blushing sky,
 Where silver fountains play,
 Amid dark forests, and leaf-hidden cells,
 The mountain tops and perfume-breathing dells,
 He dreamed his soul away!

His life has been a tale,
 Well told, where every line and word is bright,
 A silver tissue of unshaded light—
 Then weep ye not, nor wail!
 Bury him in a spot,
 Where the first sunbeam lights, where the birds sing,
 The wild flowers blossom, and the green vines cling—
 He shall not be forgot.

MASONICK RECORD.

DE WITT CLINTON.

Colonel S. L. Knapp, formerly of this city, known as one of the most elegant scholars and accomplished orators of the age, recently made to the General Grand Chapter of Royal Arch Masons of the United States, convened at New-York, as chairman of a committee, the following admirable report, relative to the demise of the late Governor Clinton. Colonel Knapp, in his beautiful eulogy, has rendered no more than justice to its illustrious subject, who was at once a brilliant ornament to the institution which it was his pride to cherish, and an honour to the nation which now mourns his absence from her councils. Among all the splendid and finished tributes which have been poured from the hearts and pens of his bereaved friends, we have seen none more chaste, more just, or more affecting, than that which follows. [Boston Bulletin]

The committee, that had under consideration the subject of a proper notice of our bereavement in the death of DE WITT CLINTON, the first officer of this masonick body, ask leave to report—

That, as more than nineteen months have elapsed since this mournful event, in their opinion the customary funeral rites so consonant to the heaviness of recent grief, and so proper in their season, should be dispensed with at this meeting; as shrouding our council chamber in black, or wearing a badge of mourning for thirty days, would add nothing to the deep sense we feel at our loss, or fix more indelibly on our minds the recollections of his services; but as no accident nor length of time, can ever efface, or blot out his name from the pages of his country's history, or lessen the weight of his character, we deem it most meet and proper, while in session for the first time after his death, to leave on our records a brief memorial of so great and good a man as our late High Priest, and also to tell the world how sincerely we loved him, and to give our successors, or those who may search our archives, hereafter, to understand what manner of man we thought him; we, who lived in his day, and were guided by his councils.

For in him were united exalted genius, profound acquirements, a happy tact in business, with great patience and unwearied industry. In the morning of life, he took up the noble determination to be great; and to make usefulness the basis of that greatness.

He came to the duties of a freeman when our republic, exhausted with the struggles for independence, was attempting to fix our institutions upon the rights of man, and the principles of eternal justice, but there was often seen a timid hand and a vacillating policy. In the conflict of honest opinions he boldly took his part, and if his zeal at times excited the fears of his followers, his patriotism won the hearts of his opponents.

The portals of knowledge were then just opening anew, in this country, with the brightest promises, and he was charmed with all her paths. With the grasp of genius, he held the lamp of science through the wanderings of literature, and the mazes of politics; and moral, political and literary institutions received advantages from his intellectual light; nor was he content to rest here, for he saw at a glance that Omnipotence, when he stamped the features and marked the physiognomy of the earth, gave intimations to man that he might change and improve these features for his benefit. His mind no sooner conceived, than his soul was fired with the project, which he carried into effect; it was no narrow plan, no pitiful experiment, governed by village economy, or district politics: the design was worthy of a mastermind, and the execution of an herculean arm; the seas of the wilderness were united with the Atlantic ocean. He saw the labour finished, and heard the voice of the people pronounce it to be good. In the midst of these arduous labours, he did not forget how much human happiness depends upon well regulated affections and permanent charities, and he entered the pale of our order, and assumed the duties of master, almoner, and priest; to teach the ignorant and to check the wandering; to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and to implore blessings upon all mankind.

He was morally as well as physically, brave—and in the generosity of his nature, pitted that miserable flock, who, in the mild and peaceful day, turned their plumage to the sun for brilliant reflections to attract notice and gain admiration from the world; but who were not to be found when the elements were troubled: He poised his eagle wing in the whirlwind, and fearlessly breasted the peltings of the storm.

His enemies reviewing his life, are silent when they cast up the amount of his virtues, and his friends love him the more when they recount the deeds he has done; malice never charged him with avarice, nor did slander ever whisper that he could be corrupted by gold: if sometimes disappointed ambition in a paroxysm, at the loss of office, alleged that he was partial, in a calmer moment she was forced to confess that his errors (for he was human, and could not be free from them,) sprung from the irregular pulsation of too warm a heart; and from too much confidence in the professions of assimilated virtue; and even envy, that first wishes and then believes all ill—owns, since he is gone, that the only harvest he ever gathered in was glory; and all must acknowledge, that the only estate that he left for his orphan children, is his fame.

His exertions were not limited to the temporal welfare of his fellow men, for he knew that the excellency of all knowledge consists in divine truth, and he was unremitting in his efforts to disseminate the sacred writings, believing that in them are the oracles of God, and the promises of everlasting life.

His death has been deplored as that of one who died too early; but if the prominent deeds of men are so many milestones in the journey of life, his course cannot have been short who has set up so many monuments as he travelled onward to eternity,—true, all was finished before age had required the sustaining staff, or the helping hand.

Such was our companion and brother, the late chief officer of this General Grand Chapter—the pride of those who lived and acted with them and an example for those who may hereafter arise to take a distinguished part in the welfare of our country.

Let learned biographers write his life; let talented artists chisel his monument, and mould his bust for an admiring people, while we must content ourselves with a miniature profile of him, traced in a single moment, when kneeling at our altars; but there is some consolation for us in feeling that this sketch is made, as it were, upon our jewels, and is to be worn on our breasts, an emblem, a faint one, indeed, of his image in our hearts.

PUBLIC OPINION.

Extract from an Address to the Voters of Lebanon county, Pennsylvania, adopted at a Meeting of Young Men opposed to persecution, held in Lebanon, of which George Meily was president, Isaac Seibert and George Smith vice presidents, and Thomas L. Baldorf and Danie Reiman, Secretaries.

Unquiet spirits, ambitious of power and rank, and stifling their sense of right under the affected garb of patriotism, have discovered the means of creating turmoil, which should be deprecated by all parties as dangerous to the common weal. They have endeavoured to stigmatize an unoffending and defenceless society, whose members are generally as estimable as their fellow citizens at large, with dark and mysterious crimes, they have established papers in different parts of the commonwealth, whose editors have been brought for the purpose from New-York; they boldly avow that they intend to deprive that society not merely of freedom of action, but of liberty of conscience; they attempt to arouse the suspicions of the people, to excite their fears, and stimulate their revenge against that society; they desire to dissolve the ties of parent and child—of brother and brother—of friend and friend—of neighbour and neighbour. And from what motive arise these effects? It is—and there are few, if any, who can lay their hands on their hearts, and say that it is not—the desire of office. To what other motive can we attribute them? Hated to that ancient society, the freemasons—on whose aid liberty all over the world has never called in vain.

The anti-masonick convention at Harrisburg, consisting of delegates from a dozen counties, was assembled, ostensibly, not to nominate a governor, but to denounce masonry. Masonry was denounced by it—but the secret object of the meeting—the real intention of the wireworkers, the master-spirits, the jugglers behind the curtain, was not the denunciation of masonry; on the contrary, it was the election of a governor, who should be their tool, their creature, and bestow offices on their friends and on themselves. Those leaders had sufficient influence on the prejudices of a portion of the people to assemble a convention opposed to masonry. But feeling themselves inadequate, either in talents, reputation, or power, to attain their purpose, they procured an ambassador from New-York, to attend their convention, direct their proceedings, and make a governor for Pennsylvania! Has it come to this? Is it to be believed, is it for a moment to be supposed, that the proud state of Pennsylvania, the key stone of the federal arch, is so reduced in virtue, liberty and independence, that she must select her governor according to the direction of a faction in New-York, which out of more than 200,000 votes, could only obtain for its candidate the miserable minority of 30,000? It would be disgrace enough to be the obsequious vassal of the whole people of a neighbouring state; but to obey the commands of such a pitiful minority would be in truth, drinking the cup of meanness to its lees.

It is to be observed that the leaders of the party opposed to Mr. Wolf, arrogate to themselves an exclusive patriotism—that they disregard all the old distinctions of political parties—that they assume to be the only true friends of liberty—that they pronounce the whole fraternity of freemasons guilty of the most atrocious crimes, and sworn and devoted foes to freedom. To answer these charges we have only to appeal to the stern and faithful evidence of history. Go before the walls of Quebec, and ask yourselves whose blood the earth there drank. It was the blood of RICHARD MONTGOMERY—a mason, an Irishman, who left a lovely family and the richest possessions, to give up his life in defending the rights of man. Visit Bunker's Hill—whose benignant features are those which your fancy pictures writing in the agonies of death? They are the features of JOSEPH WARREN, a grand master of Masons, the first great martyr in the cause of that glorious freedom which now blesses us, who but a few hours previous to his death, exclaimed, "Sweet and pleasant it is to die for one's country."

Friends and fellow citizens, are these examples enough to convince you that masonry is not at enmity with freedom? If they are not, look at the late secretary of state, HENRY CLAY, whom some of you have opposed, and others have supported, but whose extraordinary powers of mind, and eminent services to our common country and to universal liberty, all of you will acknowledge—and know that he too is a mason; mark you, likewise, that venerable and illustrious man, whom the voice of the people, after a bitter and fierce contest, has elevated to the presidential chair, that very man, whom several of the leaders of the anti-masonick party in this state have so warmly supported, and behold ANDREW JACKSON, grand master of masons, victor at New-Orleans, president of the United States.

Yet if these instances of tried and undaunted patriotism will not suffice to convince you of the justice of our opinions, we will remind you of that gallant bark, which, in "times that tried the souls of men," crossed the Atlantic—bearing what? whom? gold? a prince? No!—but that which is better than gold or princes—a stout and devoted heart, the heart of LAFAYETTE. He left every thing that ordinary men deem desirable in life, a beautiful wife, wealth, rank, power, to combat for a stranger people, against those very principles which gave him that wealth, rank and power. He is a mason.

Let us revert to that calm and tranquil form, in a printing office in Philadelphia, and in the courts of kings, to him who snatched the sceptre from tyrants, and brought down the lightning from heaven, to FRANKLIN, whose death was considered a calamity to the human race. He was a grand master of masons. And then we will approach proudly, yet mournfully, to the banks of the Potomack, and bow ourselves reverently before the sacred tomb of Mount Vernon. Whose awful ashes repose there? Those of a grand master of masons, of the master spirit of his age, the father of his country, the one WASHINGTON.

We will inquire who it was that first taught the world that steam could supercede canvass, and not only impel huge vessels over our rivers, but propel them from continent to continent, and from ocean to ocean. It was ROBERT FULTON, a Pennsylvanian, a mason; he has changed the intercourse between nation and nation—he has given a new aspect to the commerce of mankind—he has bequeathed us a new method of defending our shores, and defeating our foes.

Turn your attention to those magnificent internal improvements which connect state with state—more than the flow of blood and kindred make us one nation—turn especially to that vast and stupendous work, the Erie canal, only second in its vastness and grandeur to the mighty mind of its projector, and then say if you can, whether the father of our internal improvements, the first freemason in America, DE WITT CLINTON, was an enemy to the freedom and prosperity of his country.

There is one, at the mention of whose name no Pennsylvanian, whether he be a federalist or a democrat, can suppress feelings of unbounded respect and gratitude. We mean SIMON SNYDER, three times elected governor of this commonwealth, an eminent freemason, a man in whom there was no guile, a statesman whom no one has the audacity to say was unfaithful to his trust, or tritonal to liberty.

But perhaps the opponents of Mr. Wolf expect to balance the services rendered by all these friends of freedom and of mankind, by placing certain distinguished despots of the eastern continent into the opposite scale. Let them bring forward their Ferdinand of Spain, his arms stained with blood, his heart blackened with ingratitude, his name damned to everlasting infamy;—let them call up the autocrat, Alexander of Russia, from his gloomy grave, and prove by his testimony, that the spirit of freemasonry is at variance with the lights of man;—let them appeal to Don Miguel of Portugal, fratricide, usurper, wholesale murderer as he is, and as the news of every succeeding day proves him to be, and defend their accusations against freemasonry by his sacred evidence. These respectable leaders of the anti-masonick confederacy have spilled the best blood of Spain, Portugal and Russia on the scaffold, in suppressing freemasonry, and preserving what anti-masons would fain persuade us is freedom. What is freedom? The control of one over millions: the preservation of the power of those who are arbiters of life and death in Spain, Portugal, and Russia! Here are three monarchs, chiefs of anti-masonry. Summon forth from the dread precincts of a better world than this, the shades of the masons, WARREN, FRANKLIN and WASHINGTON. Array against them the anti-masons, the Emperor Alexander, King Ferdinand, King Miguel. Is there an American in whose veins runs a particle of that blood which bought us liberty in 1776, that can doubt whether he should follow Ferdinand, the anti-mason, or Washington, the mason.

Friends and fellow citizens, there is not one of the individuals of the committee which reports this address, that is a mason. They do not pretend to understand the doctrines and tenets of freemasonry. But they know that the most eminent among the friends of toleration, freedom and independence in this nation were freemasons. If there be an individual in the whole republic so base as to charge these wonderful men, who have cemented the foundation of our liberty with their blood, with loyalty to that liberty, then we must say that devotion to liberty is folly, and liberty itself a shadow. According to our constitutions of the general and state government, liberty of conscience is guaranteed to all. But if a person be proscribed because he is a freemason, another may be proscribed because he happens to be a Presbyterian, or a Lutheran, a Methodist, a Baptist, a Quaker, or an Episcopalian. If the unhappy and miserable man, Morgan, was murdered in New-York by a mason, murders have been committed at different times by members of the religious sects which we have enumerated. Because there is one bad deed done by the members of a society, religious or moral, it does not follow that all the members should be condemned. If it were so, all the world, Christians, Mahometans, Jews, Pagans, all would be condemned. Following the spirit of those who fell or fought in the cause of liberty of conscience, in our glorious revolution, we adjure you to maintain the freedom of conscience, without which freedom so dear, purchased by our fathers, is a worthless inheritance.

On motion, it was resolved, that George Melly, Dr. Henry Schenck, Peter Baudorff, Joshua Krause, Wm. Melly, Adam Ritschar, Jr. and Samuel Harbeson, be a committee of correspondence for Lebanon county.

FREEMASONRY.

The manner in which this subject has been permitted to be treated in a portion of the newspapers of the present day, merits the severest censure; while the arraignment of some of the anonymous contributors of articles on this theme has excited our pity and contempt. We say arraignment, in allusion to the nameless ephemera who have created charges and cast aspersions upon the vast and respectable body of our fellow-citizens who constitute these associations in our country, and thereby, or sooth, instituting themselves a tribunal through which the investigation is to pass—reversing the rules of law and justice, by demanding the innocence of the accused to be proved—call upon the hundreds of thousands on whom they fixed their shadowy imputations to come to trial.

The trash that has appeared on this subject, we are aware, has been stirred up by the Morgan affair; but were its disclosures founded on fact, and his destruction proved to have been equal in wickedness and terror to the wildest imaginings; were its alleged perpetrators proved to be members of a genuine masonic body,—and was there a tribunal of proper dignity and authority, before which the masonic brethren could be made to appear; in our opinion, they would be more bound to defend themselves against the charge of a participation in the crime of the few assassins that might be found to have been incorporated in their body, than would the eleven apostles to clear themselves of a charge of participation in the crime of Judas Iscariot.

The truth or falsehood of the supposed disclosures of Morgan, and of his murder, are therefore immaterial to the notice we are at present taking; nevertheless, there is one view of the former, which we will take this opportunity to mention; and however plausible these disclosures may appear on a superficial glance, however much of the colouring of truth they may receive from circumstances, to such as are habituated to submit conclusions to the severe examinations of reason, and to adopt conclusions of the judgement, this view will furnish a powerful argument at least, for utter disbelief in their genuineness. The world could have no other test to apply to this question of genuineness, but the admission of freemasonry. Its truth or falsehood, no respectable and credible members of the society would either admit or deny, for reason, that if truth was denied to a fictitious disclosure, and the truth of any subsequent disclosure compelled them to silence, their silence would naturally be regarded as an admission of fact. To withhold from admission and denial, could in any event then, be the only policy of the masonic brethren, and therefore, an unfounded, fictitious exposure of masonic secrets, would serve precisely as well the purpose of Morgan, as truth. Did he then, is the question, when invention would serve as well as facts, and urged only by an uncertain prospect of profit in the sale of his book, disclose facts, and violate oaths of a nature believed to be so tremendous, as to involve the eternal perdition of his soul?

In relation to the destruction of this man, the whole body of the community has been in commotion, and curiosity stimulated to the highest degree; investigation has been carried to the very verge of human skill and ability; justice has been roused by the universal indignation, and penetrated every ramification hope pointed out, and not a solitary fact has been proved, upon which the alleged perpetrators of this act can be convicted of the killing, and now it is to be borne in mind that all this mystery and horror, thrown about the circumstance of his absence, are precisely what a crafty knave would have enacted for the purpose of giving that effectual edge to the appetite of curiosity, necessary to the accomplishment of his views.

We have said in silence on the first question could be the only policy of respectable and credible masons; from political, or other motive, some persons in the state of New-York, declaring themselves to be masons, have however, pretended to confess the truth of these oft mentioned disclosures. In this matter, only this remark need be appended, that, if their own assertions are to be credited, they have violated the sanctity of the highest oaths, and demand of the people to be believed on a simple statement; that statement declaring the stupid nummery of Morgan's book, to be the features of a venerable institution, ranking among its members the wise and good of every age and country, and pointing far back towards the creation of the earth for the period of its birth.

Among the many other foolish things also, that have proceeded from the mouth of ignorance or malice, it has been alleged that in these secret societies, there exists danger to our social compact and to the liberties of our country. It would have been too idle an allegation to have drawn forth a comment had it not given us the opportunity of bringing to the mind of our readers this appropriate and beautiful fact, that every general officer of the American Revolution, was a mason, with the single, solitary exception of Benedict Arnold.

The world need not be informed that the great masonic family are scattered over the bottom of our happy land, its numbers embrace thousands of citizens excellent in all the social relations, and combine the names of the illustrious in the hall and in the field; and we experience the highest gratification in the evident determination of that society to remain upon the proud eminence upon which they have stood for ages, untouched, and regardless of the shafts of calumny and fanaticism.

The foregoing rather doubtful remarks, have been thrown together, because of the recent appearance of an attempt to extend the anti-masonic mania into our section of the country. In the northern states it seems, this subject, loaded with general contempt, is fast sinking into the silence from which it was called by political or other unworthy motives, and it can boast now but of such advocates as are bound to it from intemperate zeal, or hopes of profit. A bundle of catch penny productions was sent to us through the post-office, entitled the anti-masonic almanack, from Rochester, in the state of New-York. We requested the postmaster to return the dirty sheets to the author, which we understand he has done.

We have noticed with pleasure that the columns of the southern papers generally, have not encouraged nor been opened to attacks on this institution. Our brethren of the type in this state, in particular, except in one or two instances, appear to agree with the sentiments we have advanced in relation to this subject. The Alabama Journal admitted one such communication, but gave it entire discountenance by very appropriate and pointed remarks.

THE TRAVELLER.

From the Foreign Quarterly Review.

SKETCH OF ARMENIA.

The Armenians, so curiously distinguished amongst Asiatic nations by their pacific tendency and patient industry, are naturally rejoiced at the extension of the Russian power, which substitutes security and perfect toleration for anarchy and extortion. They are the most valuable subjects of the Caucasian provinces; and when we consider how numerous they are on the frontiers of Russia, Persia, and Turkey, we need feel little surprise at the rapid increase of the former power, at the expense of the two latter, while the Armenians fly daily to the protection of the Russians, and carrying with them all the wealth, industry, and intelligence, leave to the brutal government they desert, nothing but depopulated provinces.

Of all those migrations, the most remarkable, and the most important in its consequences, was that which took place in 1822, when the Patriarch of the Armenians fled, with all his clergy, from the convent of Etchmiadzin, in the province of Erivan, at that time belonging to Persia, and sought shelter within the frontiers. The reception which he met with was suited to his rank and influence. The Turks and Persians, on the other hand, viewed his flight with no less grief than astonishment. The convent of Etchmiadzin, situated at the foot of Mount Ararat, is regarded with much more than ordinary veneration, by Mahomedan as well as Christian nations.

The solitary grandeur of the place, and the sacred character of Ararat, whose eternal snows are connected by holy writ and general tradition with the earlier history of mankind, impress on the minds of devout Moslems a sense of awe which, in former wars, protected from injury the Christian inmates of the convent. Latterly, however, the tribes of Kurds, which wander on the frontiers of the contending power, less restrained by religious scruples than the Turks and Persians, ventured to pillage the convent to repeat their insults, and even to put to death some of the clergy; the Patriarch, therefore, had no alternative left but to fly to that power which was able to protect him. Religion constitutes him the head of the nation, and he is regarded with so much the greater reverence, as the suspension of political existence leaves no other rallying point to the cherished nationality of an ancient kingdom. The king of Erivan immediately pressed him to return, and when his application failed an ambassador extraordinary was sent to General Yermoloff, from Abbas Mirza, soliciting the return of the Patriarch; but the Russian general was too well aware of the advantages to be derived from the presence of the Armenian pontiff, and sternly refused to expose him to fresh insults, by allowing his departure. As the convent of Etchmiadzin is now, in consequence of the cessions made by Persia, in the treaty of Turkman-Tchal, included within the limits of Russia, the Patriarch, may, perhaps, safely resume his ancient seat; but the history of his migration exhibits, in the fullest light, the easy steps by which a civilized power encroaches on the frontiers of anarchy and barbarism.

The introduction of steam boats in the Caspian and Black Seas, had already taken place; there was one launched on the Wolga in 1820; and more recently a steam-packet commenced plying between Odessa and Cherson, performing a distance of thirty-two leagues in about as many hours.

The Armenian Saratoff, a merchant of Tiflis, purchased at Odessa, in 1816, European merchandise to the amount of 100 000 francs. The adventure yielded a large profit: and the following year, Armenians, six in number, appeared for the first time at the fair of Leipsick, and made purchases to the amount of 600,000 francs. The goods were shipped at Odessa for Redoute Kale, whence they were carried by caravans into Georgia. In 1825, the amount of purchases made at Leipsick by the merchants of Tiflis, was double that of the preceding year, and in 1825 it reached the sum of 2 800,000 francs. Thus a commerce has been commenced which will necessarily increase. The sober, intelligent Armenian, much better acquainted with the wants of eastern nations, than an European merchant could be, lets no occasion slip of reaping the advantages of peace, and an air of business begins to pervade the streets of Tiflis. Of late years many English have passed through it on their journey home from India. Travelling with a Mehemendar through Persia, they arrive at Tiflis in about two months from Bombay, and then embark at Redoute Kale for Odessa.

M. Rottiers, as a military man, speaking of Trebizond, says: "Although I do not think it can be accomplished in this campaign, yet it is much to be desired that Trebizond may fall into the hands of a civilized nation. It is asserted that general Paskewitch has his eye on the coast; but this does not appear to me probable, considering the difficulties of the ground which I have already pointed out."

In the hands of a European power, the great commerce which formerly animated Trebizond might again revive. Erzeroum, (now taken by general Paskewitch) the point in which the commerce of Asia Minor centres, is but six days' journey from it. The terrestrial Paradise, which is supposed to be situated in Armenia, appeared to M. Rottiers to stretch along the shores of the Black Sea. The green banks, sloping into the water, are sometimes decked with natural orchards, in which the cherries, pears, pomegranates, and other fruits, growing in their indigenous soil, possess a flavour indistinguishably exquisite. The bold eminences are crowned with superb forests or majestic ruins, which alternately rule the scenes of this devoted country, from the water's edge to the summit of the mountains. The moral and political condition of the country contrast forcibly with the flourishing aspect of nature. At Sinope, there is no commerce, and the Greeks having, in consequence, deserted the place, the population is at present below five thousand. This city once the capital of the great Mithridates, enjoys natural advantages which, but for the barbarism of the Turkish government, would soon raise it into commercial eminence. It has a deep and capacious harbour, the finest timber in the world grows in its vicinity, and the district of the interior, with which it immediately communicates, is one of the most productive and industrious in Asiatic Turkey. Amasla, the ancient capital of Capodocia, Tokat, and Costambol, are rich in populous towns. Near the last is held an annual fair, commencing fifteen days before the feast of Ramadan, and which is said to be attended by about fifteen thousand merchants, from all parts of the east. From the nature of the country in which it is situated, M. Rottiers is disposed to believe that Sinope holds out peculiarly strong inducements to European enterprise.

THE GATHERER.

PANACEA—THE PRINCE'S CURE.

The power of faith or credulity is often very manifest, both in cures of charlatany and the mere visit of a physician of eminence and great reputation. Hence it is, remarks Dr. Lind, that the same remedy will not always produce the same effect even in the same person, and that common remedies often prove wonderfully successful in the hand of bold quacks, but do not answer the purpose in a timorous and distrustful patient. Both general and medical history abounds with examples of this wonder-working power; among the most remarkable of which is the siege of Breda, in Holland, by the Spaniards, in 1625. That city, from a long siege, suffered all the ills of fatigue, bad provisions, and distress of mind could bring on its inhabitants. Among other misfortunes, scurvy made its appearance, and carried off great numbers. This, added to the other calamities, induced the garrison to incline towards a surrender of that place, when the Prince of Orange, anxious to prevent its loss, and unable to relieve the garrison, contrived however to introduce letters addressed to the men, promising them the most speedy assistance. These were accompanied with medicines against the scurvy, said to be of great price, but of still greater efficacy; many more were to be sent to them. The effects of the deceit were truly astonishing. "Three small vials of medicine," say the narrators, "were given to each physician. It was publicly given out, that three or four days were sufficient to impart a healing virtue to a gallon of the liquor. We now displayed our wonder-working balsam. Nor even were the commanders let into the secret of the cheat upon the soldiers. They flocked in crowds about us, every one soliciting that part may be served for his use. Cheerfulness again appears in every countenance, and a universal faith prevails in the sovereign virtues of the remedies. The effect of this delusion was truly astonishing, for many were quickly and perfectly recovered. Such as had not moved their limbs for a month before, were seen walking the streets with their limbs sound, straight and whole. They boasted of the prince's remedy, the motion of the joints being restored by simple friction with oil, and the stomach now of itself performed its office, or at least with a small assistance from medicine. Many who had declared that they had been rendered worse by all former remedies, recovered in a few days, to their inexpressible joy, and the no less general surprise, by their taking what we affirmed to be their gracious prince's cure." GALEN'S EXPERIENCE.

We often hear the members of the medical profession tauntingly reminded that they are more eager in laying down rules of regimen than soliciting themselves in following them, and that their own personal experience by no means corresponds with their theories. The charge to a certain extent is not without validity; but the modifying circumstances which tend so much to impair the health and assail even the life of a physician, are not sufficiently considered. Still there are many notable examples of longevity and happy exemption from disease among medical men. For the present we shall content ourselves with adducing the experience of Galen.

This distinguished individual, who wrote so much on the different branches of medicine, received from the Roman Emperor a medal with an honourable inscription, the meaning of which was the chief of the Romans to the chief of physicians. Conscious from the strength of his own passions of their ample sway over the body and its healthful movements, he prescribed to himself a rule to which he adhered during a long life time, viz. never to get irritated, or even to raise his hand to a slave. He was born with an infirm constitution, and afflicted in his youth with many and severe illnesses; but having arrived at the age of twenty-eight, and finding that there were sure rules for preserving health, he observed them so carefully, that he never laboured under any distemper from that time, except occasionally a slight feverish complaint for a single day, owing to the fatigue which attending the sick necessarily brought on him. By this means he passed his hundredth year. His advice is clear and direct. "I beseech all persons," says he, "who shall read this work, not to degrade themselves to a level with the brutes, or the rabble, by eating and drinking promiscuously whatever pleases their palates, or by indulging their appetites of every kind. But whether they understood physick or not, let them consult their reason, and observe what agrees and what does not agree with them, that, like wise men, they may adhere to the use of such things as conduce to their health, and forbear every thing which by their own experience they find to do them hurt; and let them be assured, that by a diligent observation and practice of this rule, they may enjoy a good share of health, and seldom stand in need of physick or physicians." THE TIME FOR WRITING.

Night is the best time for study, but morning is the best time for committing the fruits of our studies to paper. In the early dawn, while the sluggard yet turns upon his bed, and yawns for another nap, the industrious student, or author, should be up, with pen in hand, and committing his thoughts to paper, for his own future use, if not for the press, and for the good of mankind. It is in the morning, if ever, that we find ourselves fitted for the labour of composition. The stillness of the season—the general calm serenity and salubrity of the atmosphere—the renovated vigour of our physical, and the cheerful state of our intellectual powers—all combine to promote the flow of our ideas and facilitate their correct and vivid expression. Our spirits seem to rise with the sun, and our imagination to soar with the eagle, who wings his flight with that brilliant orb. The perplexities of the day, the various call to which we are subject, according to the nature of our occupations, have not come upon us; and we are left to those calm reflections, and delightful reveries, which improve the judgement, exalt the imagination, and meliorate the heart. When we hear the birds begin to sing, or perceive the first ray of light through the lattice, then is the time to rise; then is the time to sit down to the labours of the desk. The rising luminary of day reminds us of the great luminary of the universe, and conveys our thoughts to him as the source of all light, of all wisdom. In such a state of mind, under such benign influences, our genius is quickened, our judgement is strengthened, our humane affections are expanded, and our labours cannot fail to benefit ourselves, if they do not redound to the good of our country and mankind. Rise, then, with the lark, and anticipate the sun, if you wish to enjoy health of body, and vigour and elasticity of mind, and to combine these in laborious and useful efforts to promote human happiness and prosperity.

SINGULAR PUNISHMENT.

The following account of a singular punishment inflicted by the king of Ava, for neglect of duty, is taken from Crawford's recently published Journal of his Embassy to that court:

Through the night of the 1st, a fire broke out in the populous suburb which lies between the walls of the town and the little river, and property to a considerable value was destroyed. The house of the widow of the Saya wungyi, who had been the king's tutor and favourite was in great danger; and this old lady, who had the reputation of being very frugal, if not avaricious, irritated at her loss, repaired forthwith to the king, and made complaint that during the conflagration, the ministers, and especially Kaulen Mengyi, who was her husband's successor, and of whom she was very jealous, were not at their posts; for it appears that it is their special duty to attend upon such occasions. The king, who was still very much out of humour, summoned the ministers before him; sent for a sword, drew it, and ordered them, one by one, to come forward and swear upon it that they were present at the conflagration, and assisting in extinguishing it. Kaulen Mengyi came forward and avowed that he was not present; but that he had gone as far as the rung-d'hau, or town-hall, to give the necessary instructions upon the occasion. He was immediately ordered to be taken out of the audience-hall; and, to avoid being dragged thence by the hair of the head, according to usage, voluntarily made as rapid a retreat as could be expected from a man between sixty and seventy, and of a weakly constitution. An order was given that he should be punished after a manner which I shall presently describe. The other ministers, none of whom were present at the fire, escaped under various pretexts of business or sickness. The punishment now awarded to the first minister is called, in the Burman language, ne-pu m'ha l'han the, or, "spreading out in the hot sun." The offender who undergoes it is stretched upon his back by the public executioners, and thus exposed for a given number of hours in the hottest part of the day, with a weight on his breast, more or less heavy according to the nature of the offence, or rather according to the king's opinion of it. It was at first thought that the sentence, on the part of the king, was a mere threat. Not so; the most faithful and zealous of his ministers underwent the punishment this afternoon, from one to three o'clock, and not, as is customary on such occasions with culprits of distinction, within the palace enclosure, but in the public road between the eastern gate of the palace and the town-hall, and in the view of a multitude of spectators.

POPULARITY.

Mr. Canning, in one of his speeches on the suppression of unlawful associations in Ireland, thus nobly answered a charge brought against him, in the course of the debate, that he had courted popularity.

"The honourable gentleman (Mr. John Smith,) who opened the debate on the other side of the house, on the first day of this lengthened discussion, was pleased to ask of me in terms of great civility and kindness, whether I do not love popularity? Sir, I am not insensible to the good opinion of honourable men, such as him who put to me this question: I am not insensible to the good will of an enlightened community. The man who disregards it, is not worthy to hold a high official station in a country which boasts a popular constitution. I have encountered too many of the vicissitudes of public life, not to know how to meet censures, which I am conscious I do not deserve. On the other hand I desire to retain popularity; but I would hold it honourably, or not at all. Laudo manentem: or to use the more beautiful paraphrase of Dryden:

"I can applaud her, when she's kind;—
But when she dances in the wind,
And shakes her wings, and will not stay,—
I puff the prostitute away."

"Yes Sir, I love, I covet, I enjoy popularity; but I will not court it by the surrender of my conscientious judgement; by the sacrifice of settled opinions."

The manners of the Welsh must have been even less delicate than those of the Anglo-Saxons; for they thought it necessary to make a law, "that none of the courtiers should give the queen a blow, or snatch any thing with violence from her, under the penalty of incurring her majesty's displeasure."

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From the New-England Galaxy and Boston Mercury.

THE ADVENTURES OF A WOODEN LEG.

Before you had those timber toes
Your love I did allow,
But then you know you stand upon
Another footing now.

I am one of those unfortunate wights who have found themselves obliged to call in the carpenter for the purpose of mending their mortal frame. I was born complete, as sound as a pumpkin, and with a pair of as sturdy nether limbs as ever kicked. I stumped about merrily on both of them during my youth, never dreaming that I should one day be indebted for the same peripatetic faculty, to a stick of wood.

During the last war with Great Britain, I served in our army on the frontier. I was in many battles, but managed throughout nearly the whole of the conflict to keep lead and cold iron out of me. I began to think myself bullet proof but never was a conjuror more mistaken, as I soon found out, at the battle of Plattsburg, by the help of a cannon ball which took off my leg just below the knee. This happened in the beginning of the action, and I fell into the enemy's hands. We got the victory at last, as is well known, and when the British retreated, I was carried off by them along with some of their own wounded. I was duly reported by the American returns "among the missing," and my friends all imagined me dead.

After lying some time in the British hospitals I was sent to Montreal, where I met with a very ingenious French mechanist who fitted me with a new limb, so admirably constructed with springs and hinges, that after a short practice, I found myself able to manage it with so much dexterity that it passed with the world for the real bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh. I was sent home to Boston after the peace, and received by my friends as one risen from the dead. They little imagined on seeing me safe and hearty, that I had one foot in the grave.

Now though I might have claimed and received a pension for the loss of my leg, yet I resolved to keep the matter secret, as who would not? Nobody wishes to be pitied for his wooden shins, when he can have the credit of owning a pair of the real live stumpers. No mortal of my acquaintance suspected that I had a sham leg, and I was resolved to take no pains to divulge the secret, but if I got a kick upon my wooden shin even to scratch where it did not smart.

The pertinacity with which I have stuck to this determination, has led me into the oddest adventures. I was kicked by a horse on my factitious limb, and to the astonishment of every body walked home after it, without so much inconvenience as a sprained ankle. I was bitten by a mad dog most furiously in the same place, and every one prophesied that I should die, but I got well of the bite and amazed them all. A cart wheel ran over my foot and jammed it into a cocked hat: no one but admired the fortitude with which I bore the pain. Walking home one cold day with the Doctor, I stepped with one foot mid leg deep in a puddle of water. The Doctor was positive that I should take cold in consequence of it, and I won a wager of him by not coming off hoarse the next morning, to his utter astonishment.

But this unfeeling limb of mine has sometimes brought me into awkward scrapes. I never shall forget how supremely foolish I felt one evening, when I had been ridiculing most unmercifully a certain foppish, conceited, pragmatical fellow about the town; all this I did in the presence of his two sisters, whom I did not know to be such, and never imagined that my friend Walter who sat next me would let me run on in such a strain without apprising me of the blunder I was committing. "Why you incomprehensible fellow," said he to me, as soon as we came away, "what the vengeance possessed you to keep on talking in that style when I was treading upon your toe every instant, to make you stop?"

Once, indeed, I came very near being discovered, and the artifice by which I escaped detection had the strangest effects. Who would believe that the ghost of a wooden leg could break off a match! or that by saving my limb, I made Mr. Beau Babbleton lose his mistress! I will tell the whole story, for it is seldom that a wooden leg has kicked up such a dust.

One very dark evening I was walking homewards through a street where the sidewalk was somewhat narrow, and the cellar entrances projected quite out to the curbstone. One of these happened to be covered with a wooden grating, and in walking over it I trod in the dark upon a defective part, and my foot broke through. It was my wooden leg, and in my endeavour to extricate it, the unfortunate limb broke loose and fell into the cellar!

Here was a terribly awkward situation for a fine gentleman to be in. There was no getting my lost leg out of its limbo in the dark, and to apply for help would discover me. Luckily I had my walking-stick, and with the help of that, made a shift to hobble to my lodgings, where I arrived undiscovered, thanks to the darkness and lateness of the hour. But the difficulty was not over. I had lost my leg, and no one could make me such another; or, if it could be replaced, the thing could not be effected without a delay of many days, and the story would infallibly get wind. What should I do? I knew the house into which my stray limb had stepped, but was not upon the right terms with the occupant to trust him with the secret; this was the most unlucky circumstance of all; he was Joe Clackabout, a person with whom I had been involved in a quarrel, and was moreover an arrant busy-body. In short he was no man to entrust with the secret of a sham leg.

At last a thought struck me of a method to get my leg and save my credit, for I saw plainly that my leg must be had immediately, or else the cat would be out of the bag. I thought of Beau Babbleton, the foppish fellow mentioned above, as a personage on whom I might with some conscience, play the trick of fathering my lost limb; I had got myself into bad odour with his sisters and two or three score of their gossiping female acquaintance, by means of his foppery and the insensibility of my timber toes, and I determined now to be revenged upon him by means of the same intractable members. The plan was this,—to send by a trusty servant a note to Mr. Clackabout, requesting the leg in the name of Beau Babbleton, by which means I should get my limb again without being suspected, and Beau might account for the superfluity of shin-bones in his own animal economy as well as he was able.

The plan succeeded to admiration; and much better than I looked for. I had the luck to see a darky passing under my window in the morning, and him I sent off with the note. You may judge of the surprise and astonishment of Mr. and Mrs. Clackabout and his two sisters, as they sat at breakfast, when they received the following:—

"Mr. Babbleton's compliments to Mr. Clackabout and requests he will have the goodness to dispatch him his leg by the bearer; it will be found in the cellar. Mr. B. hopes to be excused for stepping through Mr. C.'s cellar door last evening."

Nobody knew what to make of this strange epistle at first. One thought it a hoax, but on sending into the cellar to examine, the leg was found, sure enough, and the breach in the cellar door where the mis-step had been made. And then what a staring and wonderment there was among the Clackabouts at the discovery of Beau Babbleton's artifice. Who would have thought it! they all exclaimed,—a tip-top dandy, a buck of the first water, an irresistible creature among the ladies, and yet, doing all this with a wooden leg! Oh! monstrous!

However after a pretty close scrutiny of this unfortunate limb, it was delivered to Cuffy, who passed for Beau Babbleton's servant, as no questions were asked, and my stray appendage was brought to me without any discovery being made. Now was Richard himself again; but Beau Babbleton absolutely beside himself. Mr. Clackabout chanced to meet him the same forenoon, and wished him joy on the recovery of his leg! Beau replied that his leg had never been ill.

"Not ill, to be sure," said Mr. Clackabout, "but terribly out of joint."

"Out of joint! out of joint, sir! what do you mean?"

"Oh I don't mean that it was hurt in breaking through the cellar door; indeed, I believe it was sent back in good order; and, truly, you walk very well with it; one would never suspect you."

"Never suspect me! I don't understand you, sir; pray, what do you suspect me of?"

"Of getting the boot on the wrong foot, for you need not think to mystify me. What! brave it out in this fashion, when you left it in my cellar last night, and I sent it to you this morning!"

"Really, Mr. Clackabout: you talk like a man who has lost his senses,"

"Really Mr. Babbleton, your effrontery is too much to bear. You will make a lame piece of work of it, and get yourself into a hobble. I advise you to shew a little more understanding"—and with these punning allusions to Beau's fancied infirmity, Mr. Clackabout walked off.

Poor Babbleton was utterly confounded, at being snubbed and brow-beaten in this incomprehensible manner. But this was cakes and gingerbread to what happened afterwards, for the Misses Clackabouts kept the secret of Beau's wooden leg in the customary way; that is, they told it in confidence to all their acquaintance, and the consequence was, the greatest rout and stir among the beau monde that ever was known in Boston.

Mrs. Tittafetty, whom Beau had engaged to marry (being his seventeenth flame), was so shocked on hearing the intelligence, that she called for hartshorn, and vowed she would never see him again. The match was therefore broken off, for nobody could ever persuade her the story was incorrect, as she knew him to be guilty of false whiskers, and a buckram and whalebone waist, and a sham leg was a horse of the same colour. Beau was obliged to put up with his ill luck, but he could never endure the sight of any thing that reminded him of a wooden leg afterwards. Even to this day, he never sees a person with a hitch in his gait without a sigh.

MISCELLANY.

ROADS OVER THE ALPS.

One of the most lasting monuments of the power and policy of Napoleon are the artificial mountain roads, which connect Savoy with France, and Valais with Italy. The first leads over mount Cenis (a mountain 5,879 feet high) by Lanslebourg to Susa, from Savoy to Piedmont. Formerly travellers were obliged to pass over the steepest height on mules or in chairs; but, in 1805, Napoleon ordered a winding road for carriages to be laid out here, thirty miles long and eighteen feet wide, which is passable even in winter. In 1815, 16,000 carriages and 34,900 mules passed this road. The second leads over the Simplon (Sempione), which is 10,327 feet in height, from Valais to Piedmont, from the village Glus to Domo d'Ossola. This road, constructed between 1801 and 1806, is the only one from Switzerland over the Alps, passable by wheel carriages. It is about thirty-six miles long, and twenty-five feet wide throughout, and is nowhere too steep to be passed by the heaviest wagons. It is carried over steep precipices, and through six galleries hewn in the rocks. Some of these passages are several hundred paces in length, and are lighted by openings. From them you step into lovely valleys, adorned with cottages, and see above them dark forests of pine, glaziers, and peaks covered with snow shining in the blue sky. Bridges are thrown over tremendous precipices from one mountain to the other. The Italian side offers a more beautiful spectacle than the Swiss, because the rocks are steeper. The grande galerie is 653 feet long, entirely excavated in granite, called the gallery of Frissinone, from the rivulet, which forms a splendid cascade near it. The road commences a mile westward from Brieg, and leads over the Saltina bridge; above the village of Ried, it goes through a beautiful grove of larch-trees, to the first gallery, and then over the Canter-bridge, eighty paces in length, to Persal. Here begin precipices and avalanches, on which account the road has many windings. At the galerie des glaciers

the growth of trees ceases, and the road rises 1033 toises above the lago Maggiore, or almost 6000 feet above the sea. At the top stands a hospitium for travellers, a turnpike, and, lower down on the right, the old hospital. Four miles farther on lies the village of Simplon, 4548 feet above the sea. The road goes along the river Verriola, till near Domo d'Ossola. At Gunt is a tavern; a mile farther the territory of Valais terminates, near a chapel; the first Italian village is S. Marco. Avalanches and masses of earth, brought down by the rain, often damage this road, so that the annual repair requires a considerable expense, which, however, neither the Swiss nor the Sardinian government have, as yet, been willing to take upon themselves. Osterwald has given fine sketches of the picturesque views on the road over the Simplon. A third road leads over mount Genevre (about 6900 feet high), on the frontiers of France and Piedmont. There is a village on the level summit of the mountain, with a monastery, where travellers are received. The fourth road (la corniche) goes from Nice by Monaco, to Genoa, through the rocky ground at the foot of the Maritime Alps. Among the other roads over the Alps are to be mentioned—1. that over mount St. Gothard, from the canton of Uri to the canton of Tessino; but as this is very toilsome, and, in some places, dangerous, particularly near the Devil's bridge, in the Urnerloch, and at the descent to Airolo, in the Val Livino, goods can be transported from Switzerland to Italy only on pack-horses. The road ascends to a height of 8264 feet, and at an elevation of 667 feet, there is a hospitium of the Capuchins. 2. The road over the Great St. Bernard, from the lake of Geneva to Italy (the nearest of all to Turin and Genoa), is unfit for carriages, and can only be passed on foot and by pack-horses. In order to shorten the way it has been proposed to make a passage for the transport of wares, from the Valais to Genoa. 3. The main road from Inspruck to Italy, over the Brenner, a mountain of Tyrol, 6063 feet in height. At this place the road is about ten miles long, and ascends to a height of 4367 feet. With this is connected, 4. the new road built by Austria, since 1807, the highest in Europe, from Bormio, in Valtellina, over the Braglio and the yoke of Stils, 8400 feet high. 5 and 6. The road from Bellinzona to Coire, over the Bernardin, and that over the Splügen, passable for wheel carriages since 1823; the former leading to the Lake of Lugano, and the latter to the lake of Como. The canton Tessino, in 1818, entered into a compact with the government of Lombardy, by which, on condition of being allowed the importation of salt and fruits from Lombardy, it promised to prevent the building of a new road from Bellinzona to Coire, over the Bernardin, and only to keep the old road in its present condition. The validity of this treaty, however, so contrary to the interest of the Grisons and the other cantons, was disputed, and the building was finally commenced. The roads over the yoke of Stils, and that over mount Simplon, are among the greatest productions of human energy and art in modern times.

HOW TO BE SICK.

It is a matter of some consequence to know how to be sick to the best advantage. The method too commonly pursued of being sick at the halves, or attending to business with one hand while you are holding your pericranium to its place with the other, is the very worst, the most tedious and expensive. There is no fun at all in it. You will only lose time, lose character for patience, and lessen your chance of recovery, by trying to be well when you are not. As soon, therefore, as you find yourself too much down in the dumps to do business properly, your best possible way is, to give it up entirely, seclude yourself as perfectly as you may from a bustling world, and remain insulated from it and all its cares. To effect this, choose a room as far from the sound of your knocker as possible, and admit none but necessary attendants. The very Sheriff will excuse you if he has any thing human about him, on being told that you are sick and in bed; but none will excuse so long as you are up, though half dead with pain. Have no side curtains to your bed—they are an abomination to the sick or well, for, besides being liable to take fire from every candle that approaches them, they confine the air, which soon becomes unfit for respiration. Shut out any light which is at all disagreeable, and lie down, resolved not to stir again for any one till you get ready. If your case be not dangerous, you may now consider your cure as half effected; since "well begun is half done."

You may now have as much covering or as little as you please; may sleep if you can, or drowse, or doze, or lie awake, but on no account think of business, or presume to look into a book. Nothing is worse than reading in bed; it is a bad practice for the well, but horrid for the sick; it will not only fatigue, but bring you back to the world again like magick. The room you occupy must be considered as your little universe, beyond which your eyes and thoughts are not to wander. But as the waking eye must rest on some object, while the mind will not consent to be entirely inactive, you may gaze with half closed lids, at the wall over head, associating stains and crevices into pigmy castles, mountains, or armies, or exercise your scone in contemplating the rude figures on the paper which covers the opposite side of the room. This, while it does not fatigue, will serve to confine the attention, and prevent the mind from wandering into more complex subjects.

As for eating and drinking, they should be pretty much out of the question, especially as you will not be very voracious about these times, and a twenty-four hours' fasting will do wonders towards setting you on your feet again. A little warm gruel, or weak tea are admissible, but even those should be indulged in very temperately.

A physician's advice at such a time will be very proper, but attention to these petty particulars will vastly aid his prescriptions, while it is ten to one if he thinks to enumerate them all to you.

Many, by adopting such a regimen at the first onset of the disease, may be able to emerge into the world again, after obliterating one or two days only, from their calendar, who might otherwise lose as many weeks or months. TAYLOR.

NAPOLEON JEALOUS.

M. de Bourrienne accompanied Bonaparte to Egypt, and in his Memoirs gives the following amusing picture of Napoleon's jealousy to Josephine. "One day," says M. de B. "while we were near the fountains of Messoudiah, under El Arish, I saw Bonaparte walking alone with Junot, as he was often wont to do. I was at a short distance only, and my eyes at this time, hardly knowing why, remained fixed on him during the conversation. The face of the general, always pale, had become more so than ever. His features were in a degree convulsed, his looks wild, and every now and then he struck his forehead. After a quarter of an hour's conversation, he quitted Junot, and came towards me. I had never seen him before look so unhappy, so abstracted. I advanced to meet him, and as soon as we were together, 'You have no real friendship for me,' said he, in a sudden and harsh tone. 'Woman! . . . Josephine! . . . Had you been attached to me you would have informed me of all that I have just heard from Junot; there is a true friend. Josephine! that I am six hundred leagues distance . . . You should have told me . . . Josephine! . . . to have thus betrayed me . . . She . . . Wo to them . . . I will exterminate this race of sparks and gallants! As for her . . . divorce; yes, publick, notorious divorce. I must write; it is your fault; you should have told me.' These violent and interrupted exclamations, his disconcerted countenance, his altered voice, enlightened me sufficiently as to the subject of the conversation he had with Junot; I perceived that Junot had been guilty of great indiscretion with regard to the general; and that even if there were any faults with which Madame Bonaparte could be reproached, they had been cruelly exaggerated. My situation was one of extreme delicacy; nevertheless I was fortunate enough to preserve my coolness, and as soon as a moment's calm had succeeded to his first transports, I began by assuring him that I had never heard any thing of the kind of those things which I supposed Junot had been relating to him; and that even if such reports, often no more than the offspring of calumny, had reached me, and I had thought it my duty to impart them to him, I should not have chosen for so doing a moment when he was at a distance of 600 leagues from France. Notwithstanding these representations, which he listened to at first with sufficient tranquility, the word divorce still escaped his lips at intervals, and it required a knowledge of the degree to which the irritation of his mind was carried when he was affected by any serious trouble to form an idea of what Bonaparte was under this unpleasant circumstance. I did not quit the subject however; I repeated what I had before said of him; I reminded him with what levity random tales were spread and received; the thoughtless amusement of the idle, but worthy of the contempt of superior minds. I spoke to him of his glory. 'My glory!' he replied, 'Ah! I know not what I would give rather than that which Junot has told me should be true, so much do I love this woman! If Josephine be guilty, a divorce must separate us. I will not be the laughing-stock of all the prigs of Paris, I must write to Joseph; he shall get a sentence of divorce.' I represented to him that as to the divorce, there would be time to think of that after mature reflection. These last words produced an effect which I could scarcely have hoped for so speedily; he became quite calm, and listened to me as if he felt the need of meeting consolation half way, and after this conversation he never again spoke to me on the subject of it. But fifteen days afterwards, when before St. Jean d'Acre, he expressed himself to me very dissatisfied with Junot; complained of the mischief he had done by his indiscreet tales, which he began to look upon as the inventions of malice. I perceived in the sequel that he had never pardoned Junot this act of folly; and I can declare almost with certainty that this was one of the causes why Junot was never made Marshal of France, as were many of his comrades, to whom Bonaparte was less attached than he had been to him. It will be easily believed that Josephine, who afterwards apprised by Napoleon himself of what Junot had said, did not interest herself much in his behalf."

ANTICIPATION

This cold world of ours amidst its multiplicity of ills, and while it seems to delight alone, in throwing over man, the hoar frosts of a soul-chilling destiny, is not without its redeeming intervals of happiness. There is a cheering Oasis in the drear wilderness of its sorrows. A ray of Heavenly sunshine, that gleams occasionally through the woebegclouded darkness of human wanderings. Have we parted from those we love—love dearer, oh! dearer than life itself! And has the separation insulted us, cut us off from every earthly felicity, and left us sad and alone, though in the midst of cheerful faces! Has it made us aliens and strangers amidst the crowd that surrounds us; with no other hold upon its good feeling, that the stranger's claim to the stranger's kindness! There are still bright spots in the sombre shadowings of the scene; for the isolated heart has found perhaps in every acquaintance a friend, and in every bosom the evidence of kindly feeling! But above all, there is in the gloomiest hour of its loneliness, a mellow tint in the rain bow of hope, which nought save despair itself can obscure. It is the hope of meeting again, the object of all that the heart prizes in its affections, and all it dwells upon in the musings of its anticipations! Anticipation! Thou art the sweetness of this bitter life. 'Tis thou that drivest gloom from the gloomy heart, and chasest away the sorrows that intrude themselves upon the sorrowful. 'Tis thou that takest

"The sting from adieu;"

That learnest us to forget the burning bitterness of the last "farewell and God bless you" in the accompanying redemption of the valedictory—"We shall meet again, ere long"

"Tis thou that learnest the heart its flight
"From present woe to, hoped delight."

There is not in human sensibility, so bright a ministration of happiness as this. To be assured midst the stormy vicissitudes of life, that there is one who thinks of you—one who communes with your sorrows, and weeps over them, though distant; and who will shortly hover over you with the consolations which affection can alone impart, is an emotion that no one can appreciate, but he who has felt it.

THE BROKEN-HEARTED.

I have seen the infant sinking down, like a stricken flower, to the grave—the strong man fiercely breathing out his soul upon the field of battle—the miserable convict standing upon the scaffold, with a deep curse quivering on his lips—I have viewed Death in all his forms of darkness and vengeance with a tearless eye,—but I never could look on woman, young and lovely woman, fading away from the Earth in beautiful and uncomplaining melancholy, without feeling the very fountains of life turned to tears and dust. Death is always terrible—but, when a form of angel beauty is passing off to the silent land of the sleepers, the heart feels, that something lovely in the Universe is ceasing from existence, and broods, with a sense of utter desolation, over the lonely thoughts, that come up, like spectres from the grave to haunt our midnight musings.

Two years ago, I took up my residence for a few weeks in a country village in the eastern part of New England. Soon after my arrival, I became acquainted with a lovely girl apparently about seventeen years of age. She had lost the idol of her pure heart's purest love, and the shadows of deep and holy memories were resting like the wing of death upon her brow. I first met her in the presence of the mirthful. She was indeed a creature to be worshipped—her brow was garlanded with the young year's sweetest flowers—her yellow locks were hanging beautifully and low upon her bosom—and she moved through the crowd with such a floating and unearthly grace, that the bewildered gazer almost looked to see her fade away into the air, like the creation of some pleasant dream. She seemed cheerful and even gay, yet I saw, that her gaiety was but the mockery of her feelings. She smiled, but there was something in her smile, which told, that its mournful beauty was but the bright reflection of a tear—and her eye-lids, at times, closed heavily down, as if struggling to repress the tide of agony, that was bursting up from her heart's secret urn. She looked as if she could have left the scene of festivity, and gone out beneath the quiet stars, and laid her forehead down upon the fresh, green Earth, and poured out her stricken soul, gush after gush, till it mingled with the eternal fountain of life and purity.

Days and weeks passed on, and that sweet girl gave me her confidence and I became to her as a brother. She was wasting away by disease. The smile upon her lip was fainter, the purple veins upon her cheek grew visible, and the cadences of her voice became daily more weak and tremulous. On a quiet evening in the depth of June, I wandered out with her a little distance in the open air. It was then, that she first told me the tale of her passion and of the blight, that had come down like a wildew upon her life. Love had been a portion of her existence. Its tendrils had been twined around her heart in its earliest years, and, when they were rent away they left a wound, which flowed till all the springs of her soul were blood. "I am passing away," said she, "and it should be so. The winds have gone over my life, and the bright buds of hope and the sweet blossoms of passion are scattered down, and lie withering in the dust, or rotting away upon the chill waters of memory. And yet I cannot go down among the tombs without a tear. It is hard to take leave of the friends, who love me—it is very hard to bid farewell to these dear scenes with which I have held communion from childhood, and which, from day to day, have caught the colour of my life and sympathised with its joys and sorrows. That little grove, where I have so often strayed with my buried Love, and where, at times even now, the sweet tones of his voice seem to come stealing around me till the whole air he comes one intense and mournful melody—that pensive star, which we used to watch in its early rising, and on which my fancy can still picture his form looking down upon me and beckoning me to his own bright home—every flower, and tree, and rivulet, on which the memory of our early love has set its undying seal, have become dear to me, and I cannot, without a sigh, close my eyes upon them forever."

I have lately heard, that the beautiful girl, of whom I have spoken, is dead. The close of her life was calm as the falling of a quiet stream—gentle as the sinking of the breeze, that lingers, for a time, around a bed of withered roses, and then dies "as 'twere from very sweetness."

It cannot be that Earth is man's only abiding place. It cannot be, that our life is a bubble cast up by the Ocean of Eternity to float a moment upon its waves and sink into darkness and nothingness. Else why is it, that the high and glorious aspirations, which leap like Angels from the temple of our hearts, are forever wandering abroad unsatisfied?—Why is it, that the rainbow and the cloud come over us with a beauty, that is not of Earth, and then pass off and leave us to muse upon their faded loveliness? Why is it, that the stars, which "hold their festivals around the midnight throne," are set above the grasp of our limited faculties—forever mocking us with their unapproachable glory?—And finally, why is it, that bright forms of human beauty are presented to our view and then taken from us—leaving the thousand streams of our affections to flow back in an Alpine torrent upon our hearts? We are born for a higher destiny than that of Earth. There is a realm, where the rainbow never fades, where the stars will be spread out before us like the Islands, that slumber on the Ocean, and where the beautiful beings, which here pass before us like visions, will stay in our presence forever. Bright creature of my dreams—in that realm I shall see thee again. Even now thy lost image is sometimes with me. In the mysterious silence of midnight, when the streams are glowing in the light of the many stars, that image comes floating upon the beam, that lingers around my pillow, and stand before me in its pale, dim loveliness, till its own quiet spirit sinks like a spell from Heaven upon my thoughts, and the grief of years is turned to dreams of blessedness and peace.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1829.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

☞ The extract from an address to the voters of Lebanon co. Pa., published in our masonick department to-day is well worthy the attentive perusal and consideration of the reader. It is a spirited production, its reasoning is just and conclusive, and it comes from a body of men, none of whom are masons, but who judge of masonry and anti-masonry by their works and their effects upon society.

☞ The article upon our second page from the Mobile Commercial Register will make the reader acquainted with the prospects of anti-masonry in the southern states. It has been repeatedly asserted by the proscriptionists in this quarter, that the excitement was making great progress in Alabama, and other remote sections of the union; the shameless emptiness of such declarations is, however, becoming every day more apparent. The people at the south will not be gulled as the people of this state have been—they prize their liberties too highly, and have too just a view of the shallow pretensions of those whose only merit lies in furious opposition to the masonick institution.

☞ We refer the reader to the prospectus of the Journal of Health, which will be found in another column.

THE ELECTION. It is impossible to form a very correct idea of the result of the election throughout the state; but the returns already received promise a decided victory over anti-masonick intolerance and proscription. When it is considered what efforts were made to produce a contrary result, victory is doubly creditable to the energy and intelligence of the people. Every lie and every slander that could possibly assist a bad cause, was eagerly pressed into the service of anti-masonry; but we entertain a well founded hope that all the desperate measures of the inquisitionists have been in vain—that the actors have been visited with the fate which sooner or later overtakes the wicked. May they profit by the experience—and may their defeat be a salutary lesson to all factionists, who would build up their personal fortunes upon the ruin of their country.

PAYING DEAR FOR THE WHISTLE. From several statements which have appeared in the Lockport papers, it seems that the anti-masonick Board of Supervisors of Niagara county have made rather free use of the county funds, and that in consequence thereof, an unusually heavy and oppressive tax must necessarily be imposed upon the people, next year. Among other items acknowledged, (officially, we suppose) by their anti-masonick clerk, is one of a "little short of $1000," for the benefit of the Morgan, excitement! This expenditure will undoubtedly appear to be an odd one in the eyes of honest men, but it will not astonish any one acquainted with the spirit of anti-masonry. It is a legitimate fruit of the proscriptive warfare which has been carried on at the west, and is no more than was long since anticipated, by those who have always deprecated the excitement. Time will doubtless unfold many other instances of equal turpitude; and we should not consider it very remarkable if the old "infected district" had been thoroughly fleeced by the knaves who have ridden into office upon the whirlwind. If the people will not exercise their sober faculties, but be governed alone by their prejudices in the choice of men for public stations, they should expect to reap the fruits of their folly.

ANOTHER HOAX! The anti-masonick papers just before the late election made a great cry about the excitement in the city of New-York, and some of them had the effrontery to publish the following as the inquisition assembly ticket for that city:

As usual, this ticket was got up without the consent of any of the gentlemen named, and several of them being favorably known to the people in many parts of the state, the anties thought this use of their names would have "quite an effect;" especially as time would not allow the truth to be made known extensively "till after election." The following extracts from the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer of Tuesday, will show how the honour was appreciated:

☞ Mr. John Duer requests us to state that his name has been placed without his consent on a ticket for the Assembly, and he declines being considered a candidate at all.

☞ We are requested to state that George Zabriskie, esq. has positively declined being a candidate on the anti-masonick ticket for the assembly.

☞ Mr. Peter Sharpe requests us to state that his name has been placed, without his consent, on a ticket for the Assembly, and that he declines being considered a candidate at all.

☞ We are requested by Mr. Anthony Lamb, to say that he declines being a candidate for the Assembly on any ticket.

Messrs. Editors—My name being placed on a ticket as a candidate for member of Assembly, at the ensuing election, I request you to say that it was done without my knowledge, consent or approbation; and that I decline the honour intended me. THOMAS HERTEL.

David Marsh was a successful republican candidate for Alderman of the 11th ward, at the same election! Edward Arrowsmith was a member of the republican committee of vigilance of the 4th ward, and Isaac Ammerman of the 9th ward! How consistent these anties are!

ANTI-MASONRY "GOING AHEAD"! One James P. Finch, "a famous distributor of itch ointment and anti-masonick newspapers" lately left Saratoga Springs "between two days," the Sentinel says, "to escape an attempted abduction on the part of his creditors." It seems from this that anti-masonry and the itch go together sometimes, and that they are about upon a level in Saratoga. When Solomon Southwick makes another pilgrimage we advise him to lecture upon both subjects.

The oracle of the inquisition, for this city, with one foot in the grave and the other following, says that anti-masonry is increasing "in numbers." It would be a difficult matter for it to increase in wickedness; and the would-be governor will soon be convinced that another such an increase "in numbers" as it has met with at the late election, would put it where it would be likely to "stay put."

N. H. CARTER, Esq. late editor of the New-York Statesman, author of "Letters from Europe," &c. sailed a few days since for Marseilles, France. His object is to benefit his health.

THANKSGIVING. The proclamation of Lieut. Governor Throop recommending the observance of Thursday, the 3d of December, as a day of Thanksgiving and Prayer, will be found on our last page. The 26th inst. is set apart by the governors of Connecticut and Massachusetts, and the act-governor of Maine, for the same purpose.

MONUMENT TO JOHN ADAMS. The Boston Patriot states that the Monument to the late JOHN ADAMS, second President of the United States, which has been preparing by direction of his son, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, sixth President of the United States, was erected on Tuesday week, in the Congregational Church, at Quincy, Mass. The material is Italian marble. The inscriptions are as follows:

From Fancy's Dreams to active Virtue turn:

Let Freedom, Friendship, Faith, thy soul engage,

The capitals D. O. M. are the initials of three Latin words; Deo, Optimo, Maximo. To God, the Best, the Greatest.

Upon the marble Tablet, the inscriptions are placed parallel to each other, divided by a plain line. To accommodate them to our columns, we are obliged to give them in type a different arrangement.

Foughkeepsie Hotel. Every body has heard of that famous depot of Dutch burghers—Foughkeepsie—of its location on a delightful plain at a little distance from the Hudson—of its court house, its jail, its bank, academy, churches, printing offices, and a long chapter of fine sights—but every body has not heard of Hatch's retreat for travellers, and his peculiar manner of making them comfortable and happy.

There is good reason for this to be sure; as Hatch has yet hardly put his house in order and raised his eggs; but as soon as the news can fly—and the Dutch descendants are said to be not slow in retailing gossip—Hatch's name will be in the mouth of every lover of turtle and canvas back.

His buildings are the most spacious and splendid on the river between the "emporium" and "capital" of New-York; and are furnished throughout in the most tasteful style of the times. When we declare our host to be the late presiding genius of the "Fishkill Mansion House," our travelled readers, who have visited that section of New-York, will know who we mean, and will deem any thing we might add by way of commendation, utterly superfluous.

Gen. Lafayette. The Paris papers contain long accounts of the reception of general Lafayette through the Provinces. A London paper in noticing this event, says—

"Never was king so feasted and treated as this venerable remnant of the revolution has been. In every quarter he has been received with shouts of triumph and congratulatory addresses, which, while they have been complimentary to him, have generally also been made the vehicle for strong philippics against the new order of things. From Grenoble to Lyons, the road was thronged by continual crowds of people, who came to testify their regard for the principles which had guided his political conduct, and the esteem which they entertained towards him personally. At Lyons 500 young men on horseback, and twice as many on foot, came out to receive him, and conduct him within the walls of a city, which, it is added, felt proud in having such a guest. M. Prunelle, the director of the college, was the spokesman on the occasion, and delivered an eloquent address, to which the general made an equally eloquent and complimentary reply. The magistrates and other authorities of the town did not join in the acclamations with which he was received, but they did not interfere to repress the enthusiasm of the public."

The general was to give a grand fete on the 29th Sept. at his seat, La Grange.

Sketches of American Character. The Ladies' Magazine has been occasionally enriched by short and simple tales, illustrative of American character, written by the gifted editors of that periodical. Under the modest title of "Sketches," she has skillfully contrived to embody a variety of incidents, depicted with taste and discrimination, which, while they accord with the general features of mankind, embrace also those peculiar traits which may be emphatically styled the idiom of American manners. Mrs. Hale is already known, not only as the accomplished editor of a highly successful periodical, but also as the writer of Northwood, an interesting story, which, with few faults and many excellencies, has established her reputation as an authoress of considerable talent, in the department of narrative literature. She loses none of her fame, when her powers are estimated by the literary merit of the Sketches of American Character. Indeed, we believe that a large portion of the interest taken by the public in the Ladies' Magazine, is mainly to be attributed to these sketches; and the notice which has been taken of them by contemporary publications, abundantly proves that the sentiments in their favour are general. Incited by a desire to gratify those who have not had it in their power to become acquainted with these tales in their original situation, and to preserve them in a more condensed and convenient form, the publishers of the Magazine have been induced to collect them in a neat little volume, under the same title with which they at first individually appeared. The typographical execution of the work speaks for itself, and does credit to the taste of the publishers; we recommend the volume as worthy a place among the productions of the day, or as an appropriate selection for a Christmas or New Year's present. Migration West. To one who has no knowledge on the subject, the number of families that pass through this place for the country west of us, in the course of a single week, would appear incredible. And it affords us much pleasure to observe that the greater portion of them go well prepared to encounter the difficulties of settling in a new country. Many, indeed, judging by their wagons, horses, neat cattle, sheep, &c. must have been in five circumstances in the country they have left—out there are others again, who make a most pitiful appearance. We occasionally see a mother, and some two or three half-naked children, with a bag of old plunder, mounted on a limping, lantern ribbed pony, and the father, with five or six other little barefooted urchins walking along side. In riding six miles east, a few days since, we met thirteen moving wagons, each appearing to carry a separate family.

Grand Duke Constantine. A letter from Frankfort in one of the Paris papers, after announcing the arrival of the Grand Duke Constantine, in that city, broadly affirms that his Imperial Highness is in disgrace, and has been ordered to quit the dominions of his brother. The cause of his disgrace is stated to be his tyrannical conduct towards the Poles, whose affections the Emperor is represented as extremely desirous of conciliating.

We have received the first number of the Anti Masonick Republican, published at Middlebury, by E. D. Barber. The editor's salutatory is made up of threadbare cant about "secret societies." It is the idler's ravings of a spoiled child, who would like to kick up a dust in the world and make the hardy sons of Green Mountains believe that Washington, and Jefferson, and Lafayette, and Franklin, and Clinton, and a host of others, were rascals and traitors to their country. The day has gone by when intelligent people can be gulled by such trash. But the editor in question swaggers none the less. Our word for it, however, "I am sure" will be the epitaph of that Anti Republican of his in six months, instead of being written on the ruins of an institution which has survived the shocks of time and is based on the immutable laws of Justice and Charity. DEATH OF THE YOUNG VOLUNTEER.

BY MRS. HALE.

Died he as the soldier joys to die,
When the banner he follows is waving high,
And from voices, whose tones he remembers well,
Loudly the cheers of triumph swell;
'Till victory's shout on the free breeze floats,
He hath caught its sound, 'mid the wild war notes,
—One flash of hope, his eye grows dim—
The land he hath served will remember him?

Died he as the patriot prays to rest,
His labours all crowned, and his country blest;
Garrulous age, his echo of fame,
Repeating the proud and cherish'd name;
While the spirit of youth, like a charger stirred
By the clarion's swell, at the glorious word,
Thirsting for danger, and spurning at fear,
Bounds to follow his hero's career?

He died, but not on the battle plain,
Where laurels are freshened with crimson rain;
Nor the rolling drum, nor life's shrill tone
Nerved him to stifle the low death groan;
Nor the clasp of a comrade his cold hand thrilled,
And bade his heart leap ere its pulse was stilled,
That a message of love from his lips would be borne
To the fond friends who never might greet his return.

He died, and his memory passed away,
Like the rain-bow gleam from the torrent's spray;
And ne'er at his country's high triumphs was heard
His name, that should be the signal word,
When from learning's halls, and bowers of mirth,
Young genius at Freedom's call, starts forth,
And ye read in the fearless, flashing eye,
He comes to the battle, "to do or die!"

He died, and 'twas by the foe's hand,
But not like a soldier by ball or brand,—
—A felon's fate was his fearful doom!
Yet gather young flowers to deck his tomb,
Spring's earliest buds—they shall emblems be
Of the hopes that wooed him to victory—
O, bright they shone,—but there came a frown
And his sun in its morning light went down!

And he died, and his death was a bitter one,
For taunting foes were gazing on;
He heard their scorn on his lov'd land poured,
Yet his fettered hand could not grasp his sword.
—He stood beneath the fatal tree,
And gazed on the cord undauntedly!
—If there came a pang, it blanched not his cheek—
And the wish they had mocked, he disdained to speak.

He died when the war-cloud was gathering fast,
When havoc and horror were borne on the blast—
But sure to the martyr of Freedom is given
A glance of the future, when ripe for heaven—
—O didst thou not see, young Hale,* in that hour,
The eagle's broad pinions in pride and power,
Bearing the banner of liberty,
Shadow thy own land from sea to sea?
And didst thou not feel, when pouring thy breath,
That duty done, plucks the sting from death?

* This young man was a student in Yale College, when the Revolutionary struggle commenced. He left his students for the post of danger, and though not twenty years of age, was appointed captain of a company in the regiment of Colonel Knowlton. After the British had obtained possession of Long Island, General Washington considered it of the utmost importance to obtain information of their strength and intentions. Captain Hale offered himself a volunteer for this hazardous service. He passed in disguise to Long Island, examined every part of the British army, and obtained the best possible information respecting situation and future operations. In his attempts to return, he was apprehended, carried before Sir William Howe, and the proof of his object was so clear, that he frankly acknowledged who he was, and what were his views.

Sir William Howe at once gave an order to the provost marshal to execute him the next morning. The order was accordingly executed in a most unfeeling manner, and by as great a savage as ever disgraced humanity. A celerity, whose attendance he requested, was refused him; a bible for a moment's devotion, was not procured, though he requested it. Letters, which, on the morning of his execution, he wrote to his mother and other friends, were destroyed, and this very extraordinary reason was given by the provost marshal, "that the rebels should not know they had a man in their army who could die with so much firmness."

Unknown to all around him, without a single friend to offer him the least consolation, thus fell as amiable and promising a young man as America could boast, with this as his dying observation,—"that he on ly lamented he had but one life to devote to his country."

To the memory of Andre, England has erected a magnificent monument, and bestowed on his family high honours and liberal rewards. To the memory of Hale, not a stone has been erected, nor an inscription, to preserve his name from oblivion.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

There was a day, or rather half a day,
That in my school-boy years was wont to bring
A respite from all books and tutors' sway;
Those happy hours, they sped on viewless wing.

Now as I turn to that past jubilee,
Its farthest pleasures seem but just gone by—
They are not lost in Time's oblivious sea,
But with a rainbow glory greet the eye.

I would not lose the memory of that hour,
When, halting weary on the upland glade,
We marked the deep, with all its waves of power,
So far away it seemed a light blue shade:

I would not lose that wild romantick view,
The mountain towering o'er the horizon grand,
Its rugged outlines seemingly as true
And smooth as sculptured by the artist's hand:

I would not cease to think of those sweet birds,
Those summer flowers, and thoughts of coming years,
Those fairy gifts, and long remembered words—
No, not for all besides of smiles and tears.

Oh, what a bliss!—the sultry day heat o'er,
The sun fast journeying down the highland west—
To roam away as we may roam no more,
With hearts all gay, and eyes that made us blest.

And oft, when musing o'er the "buried time,"
Will some bright scene stand forth in bold relief,
To glad the heart, and make its chords to chime
With notes for aye the antidote of grief.

No one of correct taste can read the lines which follow, without feeling that a charming picture of rustic happiness and humble life, is sketched in a manner which Goldsmith or Burns would have been forward to praise, and proud to imitate:—

BOB FLETCHER.

I once knew a ploughman, Bob Fletcher his name,
Who was old, and was ugly, and so was his dame;
Yet they lived quite contented, and free from all strife,
Bob Fletcher the ploughman, and Judy his wife.

As the morn streaked the east, and the night fled away,
They would rise up for labour, refreshed for the day;
The song of the lark as it rose on the gale,
Found Bob at the plough, and his wife at the pail.

A neat little cottage in front of a grove,
Where in youth they first gave their young hearts up to love,
Was the solace of age, and to them doubly dear,
As it called up the past with a smile or a tear.

Each tree had its thought, and the vow could impart,
That mingled in youth the warm wish of the heart;
The thorn was still there, and the blossoms it bore,
And the song from its top seemed the same as before.

When the curtain of night over nature was spread,
And Bob had returned from his plough to his shed,
Like the dove on her nest, he reposed from all care,
If his wife and his youngsters contented were there.

I have passed by his door when the evening was gay,
And the hill and the landscape was fading away,
And have heard from the cottage, with grateful surprise,
The voice of thanksgiving, like incense, arise.

And I thought on the proud, who would look down with scorn
On the neat little cottage, the grove and the thorn,
And felt that the riches and follies of life
Were dress, to contentment like Bob and his wife.

"THE GOOD OLD TIMES."

The merry, merry Autumn winds
Again are sweeping free,
—But I am and—for things are not
As once they used to be,
When all the girls wore homespun gowns,
And shoes with leather strings,
And never thought of bishop sleeves,
And such outrageous things.

Old father Time ha'n't changed a whit
Since I was five years old,
His Autumn coat is still the same—
A crimson mixed with gold;
He whistles just the same old tune
That he did years ago,
And he is quite as merry now,
As he was then, I know.

I used to love to spend a day
Among the forest trees,
When chestnuts, by the bushel, fell
With ev'ry passing breeze;
I reached my home at supper time,
With bag and basket full,
And found the mug of cider there,
For me to "take a pull."

And there were pleasant times at night
In very frosty weather,
When we before the blazing fire
Were seated all together;
The women with their "knitting work,"
The boys with each a book,
The dog asleep upon the hearth,
And puss within the nook.

But now I spend my autumn nights
Beside my fire alone,
I hear no more the hearty laugh
At jokes in "banter" thrown;
I gaze into my Lehigh fire,
And picture old times there,
Then wake and find the scene is but
A castle in the air.

O, how I long for those good times
That once I used to know,
When I wore "neckcloths" without starch,
And tied them in a bow:—
For every thing I know, is changed,
In name if not in look,
Excepting Time—the Testament,
And Webster's Spelling-Book!

OBED.

PROCLAMATION, by ENOS T. THROOP, Lieutenant Governor of the State of New-York, administering the government thereof.

It has pleased Almighty God to distinguish the people of this State by unmerited and unvoiced favours. He has given us strength and wisdom; and by His guidance we have become members of a national and state government, which secures to us safety from foreign aggression, and to each of us the enjoyment of our due civil rights and freedom of religious opinion. By His great goodness our hearts have been disposed to cultivate the growth of knowledge and virtue, by the instrumentality of public worship, of schools, and of benevolent and charitable institutions, and to consider them as means of individual happiness and national prosperity.

He has been graciously pleased to vouchsafe to us, during the past year, a continuance of peace with other nations, tranquility at home, health, and abundant harvest.

For these, and for His innumerable favours to us, as a people and as a nation, and that He may continue to us His mercy and protection, it is our bounden duty, with grateful hearts, solemnly and publicly to render our united and fervent thanks to our divine Creator, Guide, and Protector.

I do, therefore, in conformity to usage, recommend to the good people of this state, the observance of Thursday, the third day of December next, as a day of PUBLIC PRAYER and THANKSGIVING.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my name, and the

L. E. priy seal, at the city of Albany, this twenty-sixth day of October, Anno Domini, 1829.

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED. The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgments for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself, with the size, strength and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the sackings. To private gentlemen, or families boasting, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding-house keepers—to masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 37 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

MASONICK RECORD.

LETTER

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE GENESEE CONSOCIATION, N. Y.

By Rev. JOSEPH EMERSON,

Principal of the Female Seminary, Wethersfield, Conn.

Reverend and Beloved—Possibly I have had the honour of a personal acquaintance with some of your number. If so, that brother must be deeply grieved to learn that I am a mason. Such a brother will not wonder, that I should be so much grieved and distressed by resolves, which lately appeared in the Boston Recorder; especially the first. It is in the following words:—

"Resolved, that the Consociation will neither license, ordain, or install, those who sustain any connection with the institution of masonry, or who will not disapprove and renounce it: nor will we give letters of recommendation in favour of such persons to preach in any of the churches in our connection."

Dear brethren, by this resolve I consider myself excluded from the pulpit, and cut off from your ministerial fellowship; and I should rejoice to learn that I might be admitted to participate at the holy table under your ministrations. I would willingly make a great effort to mingle in your ranks of charity; I should hope that such a measure might conduce to heal the incipient breach, which threatens to be more wide and dreadful than has yet desolated the fields of Zion, could I be admitted to the privilege, without first renouncing the masonic fraternity.

Dear brethren, it struck me like thunder from an unclouded sky. Excommunications, for my secret sins, without a moment's warning, would have been scarcely more surprising. I had indeed judged from an inflated newspaper that the prince of the air was apparently pouring forth the storms and the tempests of his wrath upon our fraternity.

But "they passed me as the idle wind." Not so with solemn denunciation from beloved brethren, whom I regard as the excellent of the earth, and the glory of Christ. And can it be that I have lived to receive such a blow from such a hand?

Dear brethren, your implied anathema, (O that I could be convinced it does not deserve the dreadful name,) your implied anathema does not fall upon me alone.

In such a case it would have been comparatively a trifle. Even then, however, justice to myself as an individual to you might have forbidden my silence. Doubtless, hundreds of clerical brethren, as ready as yourselves to die for the cross, are under the same condemnation. Among these I suppose Dr. Miller of Princeton, and some of our missionaries in India.

Dear brethren, I dare not judge you. God forbid that I should impeach your motives. From the character of the ministers of your religion, I cannot but regard you as ardent friends to the Redeemer, and friends to my soul, willing to make a great and painful effort to deliver me from what you doubtless consider as the synagogue of Satan; and willing if convinced of your error, to retrace your steps and make all possible reparation.

Dear brethren, my character is my life and more than my life. If I be an offender, or have committed any thing worthy of death, I refuse not to die. But let me die like any other felon. Let me be regularly and solemnly executed according to law. Do not murder me. What felon in our country was ever treated as I am? If I be an offender, let me have a fair trial. Arraign me before some tribunal, either civil or ecclesiastical, to which I am amenable. Specify my crimes—I shall doubtless plead Not Guilty. Bring forward your witnesses. Let me have my accusers face to face.—Plead against me.—Convict and condemn if you can.

But, be assured if you condemn me, you will condemn the innocent, and the blood of my character will cry to heaven against my persecutors. I know not what high crimes you lay to my charge. But I know I am innocent. Neither against the rights of man nor yet against the laws of my country, have I, as a mason, offended any thing at all; at least I am not conscious of having committed any such offence. Are my crimes of such a nature that you cannot convict me? What then? This is doubtless the case with many real offenders. Will you murder the man you cannot convict? What then is to be done? Refer the whole to the judgment day. To God, the Judge of all, I am perfectly willing to make my cause.

Dear brethren, (I reiterate this tender appellation, because I feel it, and would continue to feel it. Too well I know that I am in great danger of feeling otherwise.) I am going to my long home. The almond tree is blossoming; those that look out of the windows are darkened; the grinders have ceased; the grasshopper is a hummer. Soon the silver cord will be loosed and the golden bowl broken. Very soon a complication of incurable diseases will hide me in the grave, and introduce my spirit into the presence of my Judge. May God sustain me in the awful hour, and give me grace to trust in Christ alone.

Dear brethren, you are robbing me of my rest and necessary food. You are conducting to shorten the short remnant of my pilgrimage. It is only for you to continue your hostile operations, to enlist all the religious newspapers and other forces under your banners, to complete the crusade which you have commenced, and you may soon bring down my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave.

Dear brethren, are you prepared to meet me in the world of retribution? Though probably all of you are younger and much healthier and stronger than myself, must soon follow if not precede me. Are you prepared to meet your God upon this subject? Have you no fear that I shall be called to witness against you at the bar of Immanuel? There you must be tried; and there your trial of masonry (if trial it can be called) will be tried again. Have you no fears for the result? Have you no fears that your condemnation of your brethren will there be condemned, when it is too late for repentance or reparation?

Dear brethren, did you presume to try our secrets? How did you learn them? By our unfaithful brethren, who went out from us? How could you know that apostates would be disposed to tell the truth? If from their own confession they had violated the solemn obligation to secrecy, what confidence could you place in their simple affirmation? It disposed to tell the truth, how could you know that they would tell the truth, and nothing but the truth? Suppose that an apostate christian should declare to a heathen that the grand object of Christ's coming into the world was to promote discord and war, and to prove his assertion, should mention the following words, Matt. 10, 34. "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I come not to send peace, but a sword;" would not the heathen be likely to form a most incorrect and unfavourable opinion of our religion? Suppose the secrets of christianity (you know christianity has secrets, at least such as are not generally known to the world. The secrets of the Lord is with them that fear him.) Suppose the secrets of christianity should be told by those who had known nothing of them, would not apostate christians for necessities, and enemies for connivance, what would be the result? Would it not probably be decided that our religion is unspeakably worse than any other? Would it not be a range in such a case it should be concluded, that though all other religions might be tolerated, yet christians ought to be put to death as enemies to mankind? That your trial of our secrets was in all respects like this I dare not be confident. That it did resemble this, and that your decision was wide from justice, I have not a shadow of a doubt.

You cannot expect me to be very particular in discussing the subject of our secrets. If they injure no one, from their very nature, they must be referred to the day, when all secrets will be disclosed.

One thing, however, I feel free to say, and most solemnly to declare, that I know nothing in our secrets, which appears to me contrary to the word of God, or the rights of man; and that I never had the least suspicion that there was any masonic penalty worse than expulsion.

Do you ask how I can defend such or such a masonic secret? It is manifest that I cannot discuss the subject like most others, nor give the least intimation whether the thing mentioned is or is not one of the secrets, any further than is implied in the solemn declaration, that if such, I never understood it as violating any obligation, natural, civil, or religious. Of many things in masonry I know not any thing, nor ever shall. God is now giving me a much more important work to do than the work of masonry, except when he calls me to bind her broken heart or staunch her bleeding wounds. Like most of the fraternity, I have taken but three degrees. By no means would I speak good or evil of what I know not. You will bear in mind, that I speak of the real and essential parts of masonry that I know, and as I understand them, when I aver, that in my view they contain nothing materially evil. Did I understand masonry, as being what you consider it, it is possible I might hold it in equal detestation.

If any thing unscriptural has been discovered in our avowed principles, our charities, our mutual attachments, I would fain have it designated.

If the conduct of masons has often fallen below their avowed principles, this has been much more the case with professed christians. He that is faultless in this respect, let him cast the first stone.

I consider masonry, a moral, pacific, benevolent, humane and social institution. As such it has doubtless been productive of incalculable benefits to the world. Nay, I regard it as one of the mighty causes which under God, have introduced the present day of improvement and hope.

Has masonry been horribly perverted? Christianity much more. If Illuminism has crept in some of our European lodges, from how many churches have their candlesticks been removed, leaving them out the synagogues of Satan, no better than lodges of Illuminism, enlightened by "darkness visible;" and cheered by the ghastly smiles of eternal death. Have the more appalling crimes been perpetrated by masonry perverted? Perhaps a thousand times more are charged in the register of heaven to abused christianity. Did not perverted masonry seize and murder Morgan? It was abused christianity that, with the symbols of the holy supper, sealed the powder plot. It was abused christianity that kindled the flames of Smithfield, and hurried to heaven the choicest spirits of England. It was abused christianity that transformed Europe into a moral volcano, which, at seven eruptions, poured forth as many millions of her sons to desolate the fair fields of Asia, to crimson them with their blood, and fatten them with their flesh. It was abused christianity that contrived and established that master-piece of infernal inventions, "the holy inquisition," that seized every victim, that presided in every court, that filled every dungeon with darkness, and crowded it with misery, that forged every chain, that riveted every bolt, that echoed in every groan and moulded every tear. Whom see I yonder, riding upon a scarlet beast, arrayed in purple, and precious stones, and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abomination and filthiness—drunken with the blood of saints and martyrs? It is the mother of harlots; it is abused christianity.

Dear brethren, you would doubtless rejoice to restore me to your fellowship, if I could bring my mind to renounce the fraternity. Nay, such renunciation would of course restore me; as you would probably hail me as a brother restored from captivity, or raised from the dead. But my difficulties in the way of such a measure seem utterly insurmountable. Should I adopt it with my present views, I feel as though

* It has been said, that some worthy christians have disclosed the secrets of masonry. I should like to meet the worthy christian who has professed to do this. Possibly he might soon induce me to confess that I have done him great injury. At present, however, I cannot imagine any cause that would justify me in divulging any masonic secrets that I know. I say this with the fullest conviction that cases may occur in which a man ought to reveal secrets that he had most solemnly sworn to keep. If any mason ever did divulge any of our secrets, my opinion is, that in so doing, he sinned against God; though it might indeed have been a sin of ignorance, and I will not say that no real christian ever committed such a sin.

† It believed has not been proved that Morgan was murdered by masons. Still I am willing in my arguments to assume it as a fact.

I should never enjoy another moment's peace in life or in death. And that surely would be worse than all the calamities that have been clustering upon me for half a century. You may possibly suppose, that, as there is a vast difference between masonry and christianity, one should be cast off for its abuses, but not the other. That christianity is immeasurably superior to masonry, that the latter is no more to the former than the feeblest reflected sun himself, I hardly need tell you I most freely admit. That I may be called to renounce masonry, but cannot possibly be under obligation to renounce christianity, I also concede. If it were possible to renounce masonry, without any unfavourable and unjust imputations upon worthy masons, the case would be altered. But how can I denounce my brethren whom I sincerely love in the Lord? And how can I do injustice to one of the least of my brother masons? "Fiat justitia; ruat cælum." Could there be a general and harmonious agreement to relinquish masonry, against such a measure I should not be disposed to lift a finger. Masonry has done well and done much; though by no means so well or so much as she ought. Her merited praises in every quarter of the world. The widow's thanks, and the orphan's grateful tear are her grateful encomiums. Courtesy and friendship can hail her with gratitude. She has prompted a kind intercourse of nations. She has softened the asperities and diminished the woes of war. She has united upon science and literature. In concert with other institutions, she has aided christianity in introducing this distinguished era of light and salvation. She was the almoner of divine bounty, to make me a member of the American Bible society. While I freely pour forth these encomiums from a full and grateful heart, I am free to acknowledge, and honestly requires me to confess, that the genius and habits of masonry are not the most happily adapted to the exigencies of the present time. I did once make an effort, perhaps the greatest I ever made, to move and remould her heart, in view of the spiritual woes of a bleeding world. But though she listened most kindly, I fear she was very little affected. It might have been inconsistent for her to have complied with my wishes. She was born in another age, and for other purposes. No doubt to a christian's eyes, glowing with love to the Saviour, and moistening with grief to a world in sin, her younger sister was fairer than she. You have doubtless noticed that masons, who have appeared most engaged in promoting the benevolent and evangelical institutions of the present age, have in general manifested very little masonic ardour. From this some have concluded that masonry is absolutely bad. The inference is ungrounded. The fact undoubtedly is, "not that they love masonry less; but these love it less more."

And now, brethren, I am free to make the further concession, that in all probability the great work of masonry is done, at least, that she has very little more of importance to accomplish. As her duty fulfils, I am now heartily willing she should immediately close her operations—that she should never enter another apprentice, nor again wield her plumb-line, nor lift her hammer. Let these utensils be laid up in the choicest cabinet of her sons, for an everlasting memorial of her industry and her aims. Let her consign over all her stock, her labours and her responsibilities, to her vigorous successors. Let her then withdraw to the shades of honourable retirement; and having gently sunk to her eternal rest, let her modest marble present the indelible inscription "Peace to her Ashes, and Glory to her Name."

You may wonder that with such views and feelings, I should ever think of becoming a mason. You must be sensible that times have somewhat altered within fourteen years, yet not so much as very materially to affect the expediency of such a measure. I will state to you my chief motive. In one of the southern states, where I was spending a few months, a great and respectable portion of my hearers were masons. One of the most distinguished of these was a man who appeared still more distinguished as a Christian. Indeed he was almost the only person of my denomination with whom I could take sweet counsel upon spiritual things. But for the influence of his example I might never have harboured a serious thought of entering a lodge. I trust that my chief motive was to benefit the souls of my hearers. I did think that, from the lips of a brother, they would be likely to hear the truth with more attention, understanding and candor, and with greater prospect of spiritual benefit. For I never found the person who would yield (as we have been slanderously reported) that masonry would save the soul, without repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. I did there ore to the masons become a mason that, if possible, I might save some of them. Dear brethren, which of you would not have done the same?

And now, brethren, I wot that through ignorance you did this dreadful deed, and therefore I can not only pray, but most confidently hope, that you will soon be convinced of your error. In such a case, I doubt not that you will make haste and delay not to make all possible reparation. You will rescind your unrighteous decree—you will restore to favour the discarded brethren; you will make me reparation as public as you have made the injury, and endeavour in all respects to "bring forth fruits meet for repentance."

Dear brethren, pray for me. I need your prayers, especially that I might be enabled to cherish right feelings and to pursue a right course of conduct, under the great trial, which God has laid up for me by your hands. Let me entreat you, if possible, to call upon me if you should visit this region. You may expect a most grateful welcome to my heart, to my house, and especially to my seminary, if you can give my pupils a word of exhortation.

And now, brethren, I must commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, that is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among them that are sanctified. If any part of this communication shall seem to express aught of malice, bitterness or unkindness, it is certainly the very reverse of my intention; and I have tried to avoid it. Never before, perhaps, did I make so great an effort to avoid every thing that might justly offend. Feeling that I had received a very great injury, and knowing my temper to be constitutionally irritable, I have endeavoured to watch it most cautiously, and I hope devoutly. If you should wonder that I have not been more successful, perhaps it may occur to you that your situation in reading is scarcely less trying than mine in writing. You will be in the utmost danger of imputing evil where none was intended—where none exists. If I am not deceived, I have written every word with a heart that would rejoice to extend to you the hand of a brother, and to unite with you in the most solemn and affectionate acts of devotion. And I do hope that I have been enabled to write with some sense that I was writing for eternity. And yet I do not know that I should now dare to send this communication without the approbation and advice of others. I have read the most material parts to several of my most judicious and pious friends—most of them ministers, and some of them in their views and feelings, have been sufficiently opposed to me. Their unanimous opinion is, that it contains nothing contrary to the Christian spirit, and that I ought to send it. Most of them encourage me to hope the good western brethren will make some retraction. If you should still think that some parts are harsh and severe, I can only say that I shall exceedingly regret it; and I hope you will be enabled in your reply, to set me an example of what a communication should be, from brother to brother, under circumstances accordingly trying. I hope I shall not be unduly solicitous as respects the time and manner of your answer. You may well suppose that I must be desirous to hear from you, at least from some of you. May the God of Peace and Love rule in your hearts, direct your deliberations, and lead you to such decisions as may be most for his glory, and the advancement of his kingdom.

Beloved Brethren, Farewell.

Yours, in the most sacred bonds,
JOSEPH EMERSON.

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

From the Transactions of the Albany Institute.

On the Uvularia grandiflora, as a remedy for the bite of the Rattlesnake. By JAMES G. TRACY.

Read February 29, 1828.

It has been long known that the Indians made use of a vegetable remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake, but there appears to be much uncertainty respecting the plant resorted to for this purpose. I believe no description has yet been published by which it can be distinguished.

The commissioners for settling the boundary line between the U. States and the British possessions, were engaged in August, 1820, in the survey of the islands near the head of Lake Erie. Among their attendants was a hunter, named Hank Johnson. This person is a white, who, while a child, was captured, during the revolutionary war, by the Seneca Indians, in the western part of Pennsylvania. He has ever since remained among them; been adopted as one of the nation, and to which indeed his habits, dress and appearance conform, and he is now one of the chiefs of that part of the Senecas who reside on the Cattaraugus creek. In the late war, he attached himself to the forces under the command of General Porter, on the Niagara frontier, and particularly distinguished himself at the battle of Chippewa, and at the sortie from Fort Erie, by his strength, courage and fidelity, and in the former action, probably saved the life of Major Frazer, who being wounded, was carried by him on his back to a place of safety.

At the period above mentioned, one of the men in the employ of the commissioners was bitten by a rattlesnake, and Hank was applied to for assistance. He immediately collected some plants, and gave to his patient a decoction of the roots and leaves; and after chewing, they were also bound upon the wound. No other remedy was administered, and the man recovered.

Soon after this, a dog, belonging to one of the party, was bitten severely by a rattlesnake in the head and tongue. Hank was absent at the time, and before his return, some hours after, the animal was excessively swollen and apparently near dying. The same remedy was then applied, by pouring a decoction of the plant down his throat, and binding the roots and leaves on the wounds, and the dog very rapidly recovered.

On hearing these circumstances related by General Porter, W. A. Bird, esq. and Major Frazer, (all engaged on the commission) and the plant minutely described by them, I had little doubt that it was the Uvularia grandiflora, and collected some specimens of that plant, which those gentlemen examined. All of them pronounced it to be the same plant which had been so successfully used under their observation. Its identity was afterwards still further established by a specimen, which it was found General Porter had preserved at the time the cures were performed.

Those persons who are generally acquainted with the plants which are found in the northern states, will agree with me in opinion, that no person of ordinary observation could mistake the perfoliate Uvularia for any other plant; and the height of this being described as two feet determines it to be the U. grandiflora, which alone of the perfoliate Uvularias reaches that height.

I therefore think that the concurring opinions of the gentlemen whom I have named, is conclusive proof that the plant I submitted to their examination must be the same with that which was made use of by Hank, and which is the a plant familiar to every botanist, and very generally diffused.

I am aware that the bite of a rattlesnake is not always fatal, even if the wound be entirely neglected, but there is every reason to believe that the usual remedy was resorted to on this occasion; and at a season of the year when the bite of a rattlesnake is known to be peculiarly dangerous, it is hardly possible that the man and dog could have both recovered without some powerful aid.

DESCRIPTION.

UVULARIA, corolla inferior, 6-petalled, erect; claws of the petals each furnished with a nectariferous cavity. Filaments very short, growing to the anthers; stigmata reflected, capsule 3-angled, 3-celled, 3-valved, valves septiferous in the middle; seeds many subglobose, arillate at the hilum. Nuttall's Gen. U. grandiflora, leaves perfoliate, oblong, acute; petals smooth within; anthers somewhat obtuse; nectaries roundish.

Hab.—Shady hills, in fertile soil, and among rocks: from Canada to Carolina.

It has a general resemblance to Solomon's Seal: leaves alternate, smooth and perforated by the stem, which is forked near the top: bearing one, rarely two, drooping lilaceous yellow flowers early in May.

THE GATHERER.

NAUTICAL INSANITY.

This madness is, in two respects, similar to hydrophobia,—it is extremely violent and outrageous in its nature, of short duration from the appearance of the symptoms until death closes the melancholy scene, and as yet has been perfectly incurable. It has been my lot to see three cases, but I have heard of many more: they were all captains of merchantmen, driven in by stress of weather to a small harbour on the coast of Britain. The first I saw had been extremely irritable for a day or two previous: the crew durst not speak nor look the way he was on. The symptoms getting worse, he grasped a large sail knife by the lanyards, and pursued one of the apprentices over the rigging of the ship. The young sailor was wide awake to the intentions of his master, and ran up and down the shrouds with agility; but the Captain was equally nimble; and while the poor lad was turning the cross trees, the madman, on the opposite ladder, let dash at him with the knife, and cut one of his cheeks from brow to chin—a frightful gash. The sailors now interfered, and after much danger and difficulty, succeeded in securing the Captain with ropes; then he roared, kicked and cursed, in a horrid manner, until the evening of the second day, when he died under a paroxysm of rage. The second, while running into harbour, seemed struck with the appearance of a gentleman's house that had been built on a commanding station by the sea side. "Fine house," he kept muttering to himself, until the ship was brought to anchor, when he ordered his apprentices, six in number, to proceed with him ashore in the jolly boat, and each bring a rope with him five fathoms long. They obeyed of course, as it is quite against all maritime law for apprentices to disobey the orders of the captain. On arriving ashore, he made them follow him as fast as they could round the coast to the large house: they did so. On arriving there, which was about a mile and a half from the bay, he found, to his surprise, the door locked, and no persons moving about, the family being absent. The gardener's wife was left in charge, and she was at her own cottage in the garden at the time. Finding this, with his bare fist he whacked in the panes of glass and window frames, cutting his hands in a shocking manner.

Having effected an opening, he jumped into the drawing room, and bowled out of the window whatever of mahogany furniture came first to hand, chairs, sideboards, &c.; cursing the apprentices to make up their burdens. The poor fellows, having each bound in his rope a lot of furniture, proceeded on the homeward march, followed by the stormy captain, groaning under a huge table balancing it on his back with one hand, and carrying a large mirror in the other. Thus passing many people on the road, the neighbourhood became alarmed; the country people gathered round with sticks and interrogated him when returning again to the house, and with much difficulty, secured and lodged him in jail; but getting more and more outrageous, the humane conceived that being in a prison was the cause, and they had him removed from thence into a private house; but it made no difference; he expired in the same way as the other, perfectly smothered with rage. The third seemed to decline robbery or murder; he wandered melancholy about the shore; and when any notice was taken of him, he gave utterance to wild imprecations. Sometimes he would take a stick and thrash the ground until he was exhausted, or hurl rocks off a precipice into the surge. This being in a remote part of the country, which was thinly inhabited, nobody molested him; or rather none of the harmless sheep farmers durst go near where he was. They kept hovering round at a distance, however, and as his distemper increased they got more and more alarmed. At last he became more exhausted, and could not stand on his feet. Thus did he wear away, much in the same way as the others did, although he was not handcuffed or molested by any one.

OPIUM EATING.

All the readers of modern poetry, have read of the famous place for opium eating in Constantinople. The following is the latest and best description of this temple of happiness.

"The market of Theriski Theachissy, near the mosque of Selymania, is the place where the opium eaters indulge in the use of this 'delicious poison.' The coffee houses, where the Theriakis, or opium eaters, assemble, are situate in a large square; and on a bench outside of the door, they await the wished for reveries, which present to their glowing imagination the forms of the celestial hours, and the enjoyments of their own paradise in all its voluptuousness. I had heard so many contradictory reports of the sensations produced by this drug, that I resolved to know the truth, and accordingly took my seat, in the coffee house, with half a dozen Theriakis. Their gestures were frightful; those who were completely under the influence of the opium talked incoherently, their features were flushed, their eyes had an unnatural brilliancy, and the general expression of their countenances was horribly wild. The effect is usually produced in two hours, and lasts four or five; the dose varies from three grains to a drachm—I saw one old man take four pills, of six grains each, in the course of two hours; I was told he had been using opium for five and twenty years; but this is a very rare example of an opium eater passing thirty years of age, if he commence the practice early. The debility, both moral and physical, attendant on its excitement, is terrible; the appetite is soon destroyed, every fibre in the body trembles, the nerves of the neck become affected, and the muscles get rigid; several of these I have seen, in this place, at various times, who had wry necks and contracted fingers; but still they cannot abandon the custom; they are miserable till the hour arrives for taking their daily dose; and when its delightful influence begins, they are all fire and animation. Some of them compose excellent verses, and others address the bystanders in the most eloquent discourses, imagining themselves to be emperors, and to have all the harems in the world at their command. I commenced with one grain: in the course of an hour and a half it produced no perceptible effect; the coffee house keeper was very anxious to give me an additional pill of two grains, but I was contented with half a one; and in another half hour, feeling nothing of the expected reverie, I took half a grain more making in all two grains in the course of two hours. After two hours and a half from the first dose, my spirits became sensibly excited; the pleasure of the sensation seemed to depend on an universal expansion of mind and matter. My faculties appeared increased in volume; I had no longer the same pleasure when I closed my eyes which I had when they were open; it appeared to me as if it was only external objects which acted on the imagination, and magnified into images of pleasure; in short, it was 'the faint, exquisite music of a dream' in a waking moment. I made my way home as fast as possible, dreading at every step, that I should commit some extravagance. In walking, I was hardly sensible of my feet touching the ground; it seemed as if I slid along; the street, impelled by some invisible agent, and that my blood was composed of some ethereal fluid, which rendered my body lighter than air. I got to bed the moment I reached home. The most extraordinary visions of delight filled my brain all night. In the morning I arose, pale and dispirited; my head ached; my body was so debilitated that I was obliged to remain on the sofa all the day, dearly paying for my first essay at opium eating." [Madden's Travels.]

Of course, as all this rapture proceeded from opium, it was a brilliant evidence of the power of the drug on the fancy. But the sliding step, the body lighter than air, the extraordinary dreams, and the headache next morning, are symptoms of such ordinary occurrence, that if the worker of the spell had been port wine instead of poppy juice, we should have said that the doctor was "drunk."

COMING OUT.

Do you know that you are standing on the very spot where I made my first appearance at a ball! I was about as gawky a fellow, with one exception,—I beg your pardon, our Joe, as ever you saw on two legs. I came hither, feeling I never knew how; I could hardly get my breath; wholly ignorant of ceremony, and fresh from the back woods. Let me describe my dress: It was a plain citizen's coat, originally of a bright claret colour, made for my grandfather; never worn except on great occasions; going down from father to son for a Sunday garb. It was too large by a mile for me; with broad pocket flaps, wide skirts and cuffs; upon which were four great buttons, like so many flowered clock faces; I never shall forget it; as many more on each flap; a rolling collar; and a row of pewter plates all the way up and down on one side. My waistcoat was of a deep crimson stuff. Instead of breeches, I wore a pair of tight worsted pantaloons, woven like stockings. I was bandy-legged by nature, and knock kneed; with ankles and joints like a horse. My feet were not over large; but in the vanity of youth, I had jammed them into a pair of peak toed shoes, that were much too small for me. Besides either they or my feet were not mates; for one of them I never had fairly on, the whole night through. They pinched my toes till I was ready to yield with pain; and owing to their genteel construction, (I got them at York) they pressed upon the leading instep nerve; may I be hanged if I don't feel it now, whenever I attempt to move the great-toe of that foot. I had been walking all day; and after a while, my two feet looked to me like a pair of bloated toads in a leather harness. I was terribly agitated; and all the blood in my body of course had settled in my feet, as the place farthest from the tumult. Zounds, how they ached! To crown all I had on a pair of white thread stockings, made for my mother, which I had borrowed without leave, and torn across the ankle. There were neither strings nor buttons to my pantaloons, by which I could keep them down; so that I had to double them aslant over my shin bone, and pin them awry over the rent in the stocking; which, after all was arranged, I found to be on the wrong side out; I was afraid to move, almost afraid to breathe; for, at every step, I expected the pin to fly out; and my pantaloons to fly up, like a criped eel-skin, or birch bark by a hot fire. I dared not sit down for several other reasons. I had on a pair of purple sheep-skin gloves too; nor very beautiful nor delicate. On any other occasion I could have jumped into them. But once where I must keep on, or die outright with vexation, for my hands were large, red and fleshy; do you think the devilish things would go on! not they! though I tugged and tugged as I would at a pair of boots, till I split one out, and tore the other open.

Al, if you'd a seen me! our Joe. My face burnt like a furnace; my gloves adhered in fragments to my flesh, discoloured and turned with sweat. In wiping my face I had left one broad side of it completely darkened with a discharged colour. But I did not know it then; I was very anxious to be agreeable; and was made happy more than once, to see how very pleasantly every body looked, when I fell into conversation, or bowed, or smiled, to the folks near me. I had a brown bandana handkerchief too; but, before I had held it a quarter of an hour in my hand, so frequently had been the application to my hot and burning face, it had turned quite another colour; almost black; and hung out smoking with moisture. My great hands were breaking through my gloves at every sob of my heart; they would not stay in my pockets a moment, although I did my best to keep them there, and was ready to give up the ghost with vexation; for if I had purposely sought to make myself ridiculous, I could not have managed better.

SUPERSTITIOUS CURES.

1. A ring made of the hinge of a coffin, will prevent cramp. [I have hardly ever known it fail.]
2. A halter wherewith any one has been hanged, if tied about the head, will cure the head ache.
3. Moss growing on a human skull, if dried, powdered and taken as snuff, will cure the head ache.
4. A dead man's hand will dispel wens or swelled blands—if it be rubbed nine times on the place afflicted. [Recollect nine times, no other number will do.]
5. Touch a dead body—one simple touch, and it will prevent you from dreaming of it.
6. Steal a piece of beef; rub warts with it—then bury it or throw it over the left shoulder, and do not look behind you—when the beef rots, your warts will decay. [I have tried this once, and never knew it fail.]
7. A fragment of a gibbet or gallows, on which one or more individuals have been executed, if worn next the skin, will prevent or cure the ague. [I have never tried this. Ma has, and although she travelled through the low country one summer, she never had the ague.]
8. A stone, with a hole in it, hung at the bed's head, will prevent the nightmare. [I have always had this hanging at my bed's head, and I have never yet had the nightmare.]
9. If a tree of any kind be split, and weakly children drawn through it, and afterwards the tree be bound together, so as to make it unite—as the tree heals the child will acquire strength. [Brother Tommy was perfectly cured in this way.]

From the National Intelligencer.

Near the Neabco Run, a little above tide water, and within 200 yards of Neabco Mill, and about the same distance west of the mail road, from Washington city to Dumfries, has been lately discovered a very ancient tomb-stone, surmounted by four pedestals of white free stone, neatly and distinctly engraved, as copied below. Above the inscription is a Death's head; beneath an hour glass, and on the side a drawn sword, all well executed. The style of the work and its date cannot fail to render this tomb-stone an object of considerable interest to the antiquarian and historian.

LONGEVITY.

The English have two instances on record of remarkable longevity, that of Henry Jenkins, a Yorkshire fisherman, who died 1670, aged 169; and Thomas Parr, who died 1635, aged 152. The Russians appear to be the longest lived of any people, as a proof of this the following article from La Clinique, a Parisian medical Journal, will be sufficient:—Last year (1828) 604 individuals died between 100 and 105 years old; 145 between 105 and 110; 104 between 110 and 115; 46 between 115 and 120; 16 between 125 and 130; 4 between 130 and 135; 1 at the age of 137; and 1 at 160."

SEBAGO POND.

During a journey through the eastern part of New-England, in the May of 18—, I made a pedestrian excursion with an old college friend, from Portland to Sebago Pond, a paradise of waters amid the wilderness of Maine. It was a glorious morning. We were in motion and among the fields, as all true pedestrians should be, in time to see the sun rising from the ocean, a thing of light and life, gladdening every living being and feature of scenery into beauty and brightness at his approach. All nature seemed awakening at the summons of her master, and to be throwing off the veil of darkness which had hidden her beauties from his sight, and the dew drops around us were glittering in his beams, as if the elves, started at his approach, had fled, and in their haste left their jewels behind them to beautify and adorn the earth. A soft morning breeze was stirring and waving the grass by the road side, as if in harmony with its music. To a melancholy or a speculative man there is an undefinable pleasure in spring time musings, and in the conversations which grow out of them. The old year has passed away. The tempests of winter have sunk and died before the softening and perhaps enervating influence of spring, and, as if in unison with nature, the invalid who has lingered on in life, during the severity of our northern climate, and who has, during its dreariness, baffled for a while the slow inroads of consumption, brightens at the return of spring, with the hectic colours "that dazzle as they fall," and at last sinks into his grave just as the flowers have begun to bloom and blossom around him.

With good company, walking, is, for a while, a most excellent means of getting along and enjoying the wayfaring amusement of the traveller. But solitary pleasures, let philosophers say what they will, are dull things. There is more truth than the world, or perhaps even the poets or rhymers who talk about them, imagine, in what they say of the intercourse of tried friends. When a man cannot have a vent for his perpetual recurring thoughts, they will turn and prey upon his own mind, and render him a gloomy misanthrope. It is impossible to be forever thinking. Were it so, the brain would soon be filled, and leave no room for fresh thick-coming fancies. During a walk of five hours, in the country, every sense is continually conveying to us the materials for new thoughts, the brightness and value of which are doubly increased by being shared with another.

We in due time reached our destination. The approach to Sebago Pond is through a rugged hilly land, which opens a communication between the solitude of the waters and the busy world around them. From an elevation of the path there are suddenly seen a few fishing huts and raftsmen's cabins close beside a slight bridge, which is continually thronged with the most patient of sportsmen. On the lower side of the bridge the pond empties itself into a small river, which in its course to the sea, sets in motion the manufactories and machinery of a thickly settled country, while on the other, the pond lies expanded to the view, "a burnished sheet of living gold." We saw the water in its deep tranquility. I have seen it in storms, (for there are storms even upon our peaceful inland lakes,) when its wooded islands would be dimly seen looming up like spectres through the fog, and the waves would toss angrily about, as if vexed that their banks detained them from mingling with the ocean. But this day, every thing was so calm that it seemed hardly possible to disturb the tranquility of the scene. The numerous small craft of the fishermen were plying silently about in pursuit of their sport; at intervals, a pleasure boat would be seen, containing a party with faces as bright and joyous as the scenes amid which they were moving; and ever and anon the cry of the raftsmen from far up the lake, would come pealing over the waters, making the whole appear like a festival day of the desert.

We soon procured a boat and a boatman, and commenced, in compliance with the custom of all the visitors of Sebago, trailing our lines amid scores of others. Ah, Old Izaak Walton, thou wouldst never more have hung over the narrow streams of old England, couldst thou once have gazed into the clear depths of this beautiful lake; couldst thou have reclined with thy rod and thy basket, and spent the livelong day in "meditation and angling" on its banks, and have seen the noble fish sporting in its waters, as if proud of their spacious habitation.

The most remarkable feature of the landscape was a dark cavern, the hollow of which had been opened from the solid rock by some convulsion of the earth. Its entrance from the water would admit a small boat. Of its downward course nothing is known. Its depths are hidden in the deep gloom of the waters. But upwards there is a rough winding passage through the mass of stone to the summit of the precipice, the only ascent at the place from the water to the brow of the hill. The entrance to the upper air is narrow, and so well concealed among the scattered masses of granite, as to be unknown except to the people of the vicinity.

Directly over the lower entrance, are traced some rude figures in red paint, bearing some resemblance to the human form, and standing as if the guardians of the dark portal beneath, and they have there remained since the first discovery of the country, as fresh and vivid in their colouring, as when they first waked the curiosity of the white man. They are covered with the same veil of mystery as the other parts of the gloomy spot where they are standing. But romance, ever ready to lend her light, when that of truth is obscured, has preserved the following tradition, which we heard in substance from the lips of our boatman.

"Many years ago, long before the whites had penetrated to this wilderness, the inhabitants of an Indian village in the vicinity were surprised by a party of hostile warriors. They had formed their encampment around the point which you see jutting out into the water, and proceeded silently to the abode of their enemy. The forest resounded with the cries of Indian combat. The villagers fought with the energy of desperation, but were at length obliged to yield to superior numbers, and leave their wives, children and property, in the power of their enemies. Among the prisoners was an Indian girl, betrothed to a young Indian warrior, who had signalized himself by his desperate valour in the defence. The enemy remained for a few days at the scene of their triumph, employed in hunting and fishing, preparatory to their return. On the eve of their departure the moon had risen in a cloudless sky, and was gilding lake and woodland with her light. Every thing on earth was seemingly as peaceful as the heavens. The party, after having, as they thought, secured their prisoners, had lain down to rest ere the march of the morrow. A slight rustling suddenly aroused a warrior, and on looking up, the captive maiden was seen flying like a deer towards the precipice. The alarm was given, and pursuit instantly commenced. The distance between the pursuers and the fugitive was small, when suddenly she appeared to vanish through the solid rock. A few moments of breathless amazement succeeded, when the splash of oars was heard from the water. The brow of the rock was thronged with the dark forms of the savages, gazing into the abyss. Suddenly a canoe, containing two figures, shot from the cave. The whistling of a few unsuccessful arrow-shots, and a shout of triumph from the lake, disturbed for a while the tranquility of nature, and the wilderness again sunk into the silence of midnight.

In after times, the young warrior and his bride returned to the scene of their nocturnal adventure, and painted these figures in commemoration of it. Time has not impaired their work, or their memory, and to this day the spot retains the name of the 'LOVERS' CAVE.'

THE PHILOSOPHICAL APPLE-WOMAN.

"My mind to me a kingdom is."

It is nonsense to talk of "the learned" as being the only wise part of mankind. There is many an unlettered fellow who can turn his wits to better account than a professor; while there are not a few of the erudite who have hardly wisdom enough to go in when it rains; not that we are altogether of honest Dogberry's opinion, that "to write and read comes by nature," but the truth is, a man may have a shrewd noddle who never figured among the knowing ones.

I was led into these reflections by contemplating the other day, the philosophical demeanour of an ancient apple-woman on Long Wharf. This relic of the olden days has kept her station there with her vendibles of fruit and gingerbread, time out of mind, and save her diurnal locomotions at morning and evening, she is as much a "part and parcel" of the Boston Pier as one of the posts. She is, in fact, to all intents and purposes, an absolute fixture. She owns four feet square of the sidewalk by prescription. Nobody thinks of ordering her or her table out of the way. She is a Sibyl, and keeps the rabble in good manners with a "stirring spell," as Mr. Willis says. She is a Pythonesse, and sits upon her three-legged stool as on a Delphick tripod. She has an absolute immunity from all the vexations, rubs and crosses which are a part of the municipal economy. Constables do not venture to be saucy to her; aldermen make their manners before her; truckmen dare not jostle her; handcartmen are mannerly, and auctioneers dumb in her presence.

"The Nubia of nations, there she sits."

This venerable and philosophical female will help you to her catables with the same air of indifference, whether you be a nabob or newspaper editor,—worth a plum, or out at the elbows. It is all the same to her: she puts the Mayor on a level with a market-boy, and makes no distinction between one who owns ships and one who writes verses. What's Hecuba to her? She sells her apples and chesnuts, and he who buys the oftenest is the greatest man in her eyes. I verily believe she would not budge a foot if President Jackson should commence a "searching operation," in person, to rout all interloping traffickers in nutmegs and sugar candy, too near those purlieus which are under the special supervision of the Custom House.

She was talking with one of our principal merchants, who stood on the sidewalk near her: he was munching an apple and grumbling of hard times.

"Terrible times Mrs. —, terrible times; people all failing; no money, don't know what we are all coming to."

"Terrible times, indeed, Mr. Snatchcopper. Is that your new ship yonder?"

"Yes, but she has cost me a monstrous sum. I have mortgaged all my real estate, and hired money to build her."

"That's an excellent plan Mr. Snatchcopper. Every man would not have shown so much prudence."

"Yes, yes, I am obliged to pay an enormous interest for the money; but then I expect the voyage will bring me in at least fifty per cent."

"Really, Sir, that is a magnificent prospect; and when you have pocketed all this profit, what will you do with the money?"

"I mean to speculate in real estate, and build a lot of houses which shall clear me twenty-five per cent. upon the capital."

"And when you have got the money—as of course you will, making such nice calculations,—what next?"

"Then I will put into manufacturing stock, and make twenty-five per cent. more."

"And then?"

"And then I will invest it in the Rail Road stock, which will be just about ready to be taken up. I shall clear thirty per cent. more by it."

"And then?"

"And then I will commence underwriter, and in a short time double the whole."

"And then, Mr. Snatchcopper, after you have made fifty per cent. by the voyage, twenty-five per cent. by the real estate speculation, twenty-five per cent. by the manufactures, thirty per cent. by the Rail Road, and doubled the whole by underwriting, what will you do with the grand total?"

"Put it into the funds, and live on the interest."

"How much are you worth now, Sir?"

"They tax me for fifty thousand dollars."
 "All which you are risking upon this chance?"
 "Yes, I really think it is a great plan."
 "So do I Mr. Snatchcopper; but how did you contrive to raise the money so quick for this undertaking?"
 "Oh! only by endorsing for a few of my friends, all safe enough."
 He had hardly spoken this, when some one came running up—"Oh! Mr. Snatchcopper, have you heard the news? Three failures! P—, and Q— and X—, all gone to the devil!"
 "Mercy on me," exclaimed Mr. Snatchcopper, "then I am ruined; I have endorsed for them all." So saying, he was off like a flash of lightning.
 "There!" said the philosophical apple-woman, "that is the way it has gone these fifty years! Empires are overturned, and fortunes go to ruin, but my table keeps on its legs. I spin no projects!"

MISCELLANY.

QUAKERS.

I love Quaker ways, and Quaker worship. I venerate the Quaker principles. It does me good for the rest of the day, when I meet any of their people in their path. When I am ruffled or disturbed by any occurrence, the sight, or quiet voice of a Quaker, acts upon me as a ventilator, lightening the air, and taking off a load from the bosom. But I cannot like the Quakers (as Desdemona would say) "to live with them." I am all over sophisticated—with humours, fancies, craving hourly sympathy. I must have books, pictures, theatres, chit-chat, scandal, jokes, ambiguities, and a thousand whim-whams, which their simpler taste can do without. I should starve at their primitive banquet. My appetites are too high for the salads which (according to Evelyn) Eve dressed for the angel, my gusto too excited

To sit a guest with Daniel at his pipe.

The indirect answers which Quakers are often found to return to a question put to them, may be explained, I think, without the vulgar assumption, that they are more given to evasion and equivocating than other people. They naturally look to their words more carefully, and are more cautious of committing themselves. They have a peculiar character to keep up on this head. They stand in a manner upon their veracity. A Quaker is by law exempted from taking an oath. The custom of resorting to an oath in extreme cases, sanctified as it is by all religious antiquity, is apt (it must be confessed) to introduce into the laxer sort of minds the notion of two kinds of truth—the one applicable to the solemn affairs of justice, and the other to the common proceedings of daily intercourse. As truth bound upon the conscience by an oath can be but truth, so in the common affirmation of the shop and the market-place, a latitude is expected, and conceded upon questions wanting this solemn covenant. Something less than truth satisfies. It is common to hear a person say, "You do not expect me to speak as if I were upon my oath." Hence a great deal of incorrectness and inadvertency, short of falsehood, creeps into ordinary conversation; and a kind of secondary or laic-truth is tolerated, where clergy-truth—oath-truth, by the nature of the circumstances, is not required. A Quaker knows none of this distinction. His simple affirmation being received, upon the most sacred occasions, without any further test, stamps a value upon the words which he is to use upon the most indifferent topics of life. He looks to them, naturally, with more severity. You can have of him no more than his word. He knows, if he is caught tripping in a casual expression, he forfeits, for himself at least, his claim to the invidious exemption. He knows, that his syllables are weighed—and how far a consciousness of this particular watchfulness, exerted against a person, has a tendency to produce indirect answers, and a diverting of the question by honest means, might be illustrated, and the practice justified, by a more sacred example than is proper perhaps to be more than hinted at upon this occasion. The admirable presence of mind, which is notorious in Quakers upon all contingencies, might be traced to this imposed self-watchfulness—if it did not seem rather a humble and secular scion of that old stock of religious constancy, which never bent or faltered, in the Primitive Friends, or gave way to the winds of persecution, to the violence of judge or accuser, under trials and racking examination. "You will never be the wiser, if I sit here answering your questions till midnight," said one of those upright Justices to Penn, who had been putting law-cases with a puzzling subtlety. "Thereafter as the answers may be," retorted the Quakers. The astonishing composure of this people is sometimes ludicrously displayed in lighter instances. I was travelling in a stage coach with three male Quakers, buttoned up in the strictest non-conformity of their sect. We stopped to bait at Andover, where a meal, partly tea apparatus, partly supper, was set before us. My friends confined themselves to the tea table. I in my way took supper. When the landlady brought in the bill, the eldest of my companions discovered that she had charged for both meals. This was resisted. Mine hostess was very clamorous and positive. Some mild arguments were used on the part of the Quakers, for which the heated mind of the good lady seemed by no means a fit recipient. The guard came in with his usual peremptory notice. The Quakers pulled out their money, and formally tendered it—so much for tea—I, in humble imitation tendered mine—for the supper which I had taken. She would not relax in her demand. So they all three quietly put up their silver, as did myself, and marched out of the room, the eldest and gravest going first, with myself closing up the rear, who thought I could not do better than follow the example of such grave and warrantable personages. We got in. The steps went up. The coach went off. The murmurs of mine hostess, not very indistinctly or ambiguously pronounced, became after a time inaudible—and now my conscience, which the whimsical scene had for a while suspended, beginning to give some twitches, I waited, in the hope that some justification would be offered by these serious persons for the seeming injustice of their conduct. To my great surprise, not a syllable was dropped on the subject. They sat as mute as at a meeting. At length the eldest of them broke silence, by enquiring of his next neighbour, "Hast thou heard how indigos go at the India House?" and the question operated as a soporific on my moral feeling as far as Exeter.

RULES FOR PRESERVING THE SIGHT.

The preservation of the sight is an object of so much importance to every individual, whatever may be his profession or rank in society, that we have thought a few hints in relation to this subject might be productive of beneficial effects.

It is well known to the physician that nothing more certainly impairs the sense of vision than debauchery and excess of every kind. The individual, therefore, who would preserve his sight unimpaired, must avoid carefully every species of intemperance. This is an all-important rule, a neglect of which will render every other of but little avail.

A long continuance in absolute darkness, or frequent and protracted exposure to a blaze of light, equally injures the sense of vision.

Persons who live almost constantly in dark caverns or chambers, workers in mines, and prisoners who have been long confined in gloomy dungeons, become incapable of seeing objects distinctly excepting in a deep shade, or in the dusk of the evening. While on the other hand, in various parts of the world, in which the light is constantly reflected from a soil of dazzling whiteness, or from mountains and plains covered with almost perpetual snow, the sight of the inhabitants is perfect only in broad day light, or at noon.

Those, also, who are much exposed to bright fires, as black-smiths, glassmen, forgers, and others engaged in similar employments, are considered, by the best authorities, as most subject to loss of sight from cataract.

All brilliantly illuminated apartments have a similar prejudicial effect upon the eyes, though, undoubtedly, not to the same extent. As a general rule, therefore, the eye should never be permitted to dwell on brilliant or glaring objects for any length of time. Hence in our apartments only a moderate degree of light should be admitted; and it would be of considerable advantage, particularly to those whose eyes are already weak, if in place of a pure white or deep red colour for the walls, curtains, and other furniture of our rooms, some shade of green were to be adopted.

Reading or writing in the dusk of the evening, or by candle-light, is highly prejudicial. The frivolous attention to a quarter of an hour at the decline of day, has deprived numbers of the perfect and comfortable use of their eyes for many years: the mischief is effected imperceptibly, the consequences are often irreparable.

There is nothing which preserves the sight longer, than always using, in reading, writing, sewing, and every other occupation in which the eyes are constantly exercised, that moderate degree of light which is best suited to them; too little strains them, too great a quantity dazzles and confounds them. The eyes are less affected, however, by a deficiency of light than by the excess of it. The former seldom does much if any harm, unless the eyes are strained by efforts to view objects to which the degree of light is inadequate—but too great a quantity has, by its own power, destroyed the sight.

The long-sighted should accustom themselves to read with rather less light, and with the book somewhat nearer to the eye than they ordinarily desire; while those that are short-sighted should, on the contrary, use themselves to read with the book as far off as possible. By these means both may improve and strengthen their vision, whereas a contrary course will increase its natural imperfections.

Bathing the eyes daily in cold or tepid water tends to preserve the integrity of their functions; provided, however, the individual does not immediately after such bathing enter a warm room, or unnecessarily exert his sight.

From the Parterre.

The mofning of Life is clear and beautiful—not a cloud floats upon the sky, not a breeze fans the earth but brings sweet tidings upon its wings, and is a fresh source of joy. In our youth we look upon Nature with the eye of an enthusiast and drink in the beauties of a landscape as it were a part of Heaven. How often have I strolled out into the woods and along the hills, and given myself up to the full influence of my feeling. I have sat down in the beautiful hour of Twilight, and let my imagination run riot among the glittering throng of clouds that wreathed their golden folds around the setting sun. I have gone out beneath the sky when the stars were lighting up the illimitable space, and felt that every breeze that waved its plumes around me was fresh from heaven—unmixed with earth, and unsullied as a dream of Paradise. Oh there is a pure and blessed influence upon the soul at such an hour, and aspirations, higher and holier than earth can give, go off to the realms of love. Fancy, free and unfettered as the morning breeze, fills the air with forms fairer than the Turkish houri, and paints upon every cloud that rolls in a flood of glory along the west, scenes that can only be realized within the gates of Eden. And every star that looks in beauty from the azure sky, seems a spirit of a better sphere roaming those fields of trackless blue, that hang on high like the canopy of Space.

There are glories in the sky, and the air, and in the fields, which the plodding man of the world never dreams of. There is the melody of heaven in the evening wind—there is a delicious and soothing music in the prawling of a mountain brook, and the gurgling of limpid waters, which he never hears—"a rapture in the pathless woods"—a joy in silent communion with nature, of which he is not susceptible. He does not hear the song of joy that flies upon the winds of spring—he cannot feel that the winds of Autumn as they rustle among the falling leaves, are but the low and melancholy dirge of Summer—He cannot stand upon the mountain's top when the spirit of the tempest is out when all the bannery clouds are unfurled, the elements at war, and the thunders and lightnings of heaven battling fearfully with the demons of the storm, and feel himself a part of the scene around him, and go off, in the height of inspiration, to ride upon the sea of clouds that are rolling in masses of blackness along the air. No! It is the poet that changes the face of nature. It is the poet whose mind mirrors the beauty of heaven. It is the poet who makes a cloud his car to waft him to realms beyond the reach of human ken. He feels, when the dews of evening are falling upon his throbbing brow, that they are but the incense of heaven, scattered from the bounteous hand; and that the twilight shadows rolling in imperceptible folds across the sky, are but the unseen spirits of the air, waving their shadowy plumes along the unimagined depths of blue, and veiling the sky but to bring to the view of man, beauties unrivalled and undimmed.

There is an inexhaustible source of joy, in the lone and silent communings of the heart with nature! The hand of an unseen being seems to drop balm upon the lacerated mind, when it steals out to worship at Nature's shrine. Breathings of a better world come upon it, and lull the senses into a momentary forgetfulness of earthly thoughts. 'Tis then the aspirations of the soul are pure and unsullied as the first rays of morn; the passions are calmed—the irritated mind is soothed, and the world, with all its troubles and vexations is forgotten.

Though the world should frown upon us, and the clouds of lost hopes, and despair hover round us, like the smoke of desolation round the ruins of a temple, still the contemplative mind will ever take a pleasure in these journeyings to Nature's places of worship. These are the heart's treasures which can never be taken away.

THE DRAMA.

The degree of patronage bestowed upon theatrical entertainments of an intellectual order, has always appeared to us to be a just criterion of the standard of taste among a reflecting people. We shall not, at this moment, enter into an analysis of the many and forcible arguments, which have been adduced by some moral writers to prove the demoralizing tendency of histrionick exhibitions, but shall be content to number ourselves among the subscribers to the principles of many gifted and exemplary men, who have given their testimony in favour of plays, as an entertainment best adapted to the taste and sensibility of a community, distinguished by a love of literature, and a predilection for the fine arts.

The faithful and severe delineation upon the stage of the passions which actuate our natures, the natural and affecting exhibition of the gentle feelings, and the forcible picturing of the sterner ones, must convey to the refined and cultivated, lessons fraught with more enduring precepts than can be forced upon the mind by study or reflection. Organick perception, in every instance, stamps its images upon our memories with a strength and endurance, which can never be impaired by the unaided operations of the intellectual capacity. Relate to a child a most appalling instance of human suffering, and he listens to you with wonder and amazement, but the story calls forth none of the sympathy and sorrow, which spontaneously burst from his heart if he witnesses the agony of a favourite dog. The history of the most destructive battle, does not cause that instinctive shuddering which we all experience, at witnessing the operations of extreme pain in a single individual. So true it is that visual consciousness possesses a far greater power over our sympathies, than mere mental perception.

Then if this be the case, as we think will be accorded, must not the great ethical truths, which are inculcated in every dramatic composition of the highest order, be presented to us from the stage with an efficacy valid and perdurable? But it has been objected to the drama that its presentments are exaggerated pictures of human life and passion. From this assertion, which has been boldly uttered, we must totally dissent. There is not a single being of the great human family, whose private history, if faithfully recorded, would not appear like the wild and fanciful creations of romance. Nay, we will venture to assert that it would surpass them in marvel. The cause of this denunciation of scenick resemblances is that we see upon the stage the occurrences of a continuous story; we there perceive the completed chain of a period of existence; whereas in real life the concatenation is broken, and consequently the abstract portions present but a feeble image of the whole to our perceptions. If a piece of cunning mechanism were presented to us in its disjointed parts, and we were told that they constituted the noble work which we had but a moment before examined in its perfection, the assertion would at least excite an emotion of doubt and astonishment. So it is with the efforts of the dramatist. Particular incidents in the lives of his characters are connected in an unbroken history, tending to its catastrophe, uninterrupted by the contingencies of existence extraneous to its completion; and the lack of the minor and intervenient events of life, is the cause of the denunciation of his labour as improbable and hyperbolic.

Some plays doubtless there are of great merit, wherein possibility as well as probability is outraged; and these are tolerated not for the accuracy of the whole plot, but for nice delineation of particular character, or for beauty of language and excellence of moral.

But assuming for a moment that dramatick exhibitions are exaggerated pictures of life, and incapable of diffusing a correct moral feeling among a people, let us ask what amusement can we substitute which will be so popular and innoxious? In large cities, there is always a numerous class whose thirst for recreation must be indulged by some means, and many of this description find an attraction at the theatre, which effectually prevents a resort to scenes of vice and dissipation. That the idle and depraved, as well as the industrious and exemplary, may be found at the play-house, is not to be denied, and their presence there constitutes a strong proof in favour of the drama; for be an institution what it may, if it possesses the power to draw one profligate, for a single hour, from the haunts of infamy, it deserves the encouragement of every friend to social order. What has been sown in weakness, may bring forth the fruit of principle; and who will take it upon him to say, that the vicious have not been reclaimed, and the wavering supported and strengthened; by reflections excited by a well acted play!

Retrenchment in the dialogue of many plays is absolutely necessary. Language which, even by implication, can offend the ear of purity, should never be uttered upon the stage. Lax sentiment and innuendo are doubly dangerous when clothed in beautiful and powerful language. The conductors of the drama must apply a pruning hand to its carious branches, and we trust the symptoms of reform in this respect which have already made their appearance, will be prosecuted to a cure.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1829.

[Q] New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

[Q] The Letter of the Rev. Joseph Emerson, which will be found in our masonick department this week, will, we trust, be carefully perused by every reader. In support of a production from so respectable and highly esteemed a source, it would be superfluous to urge a word. We are confident that those who respect the christian character and value the peace of society will receive much profit and much pleasure from its perusal.

PROSPECTS OF ANTI-MASONRY. At the late election in this state, the anti-masons succeeded in choosing twenty-six of the one hundred and twentieth-eight members of assembly, and one of the nine new senators. Their strength in the next legislature will therefore be, in the senate, (composed of 32 members,) three, in the assembly, (composed of 128 members,) twenty-six—being one less, in the former body than last year, and about the same in the latter. Their majorities at the late election were much less than they were in the same counties at the preceding one; and the change in the public feeling, which their decrease clearly proves, promises an opposite result at the next trial. Their majority in Monroe county, the very hot-bed of anti-ism, is less than half what it was last year. It may reasonably be expected that this healthy change in the popular mind, in the very locus of anti-masonick strength and energy, will exercise a salutary influence in other sections of the "infected district;" and that the decline of the contagion in its old fastnesses will effectually check its progress in other quarters.

This result demonstrates the truth of what we long ago said, that anti-masonick intolerance and proscription are rapidly travelling their downward course, and that the people are returning to their ancient habits of sober thinking, and of honest and patriotic action. These facts must now be evident to every one of common discernment; and however strenuously the interested promoters of discord and confusion may strive to create a different belief, they must even themselves be secretly convinced that they contend against the truth. As drowning men catch at straws, so will anti-masonry cling to, and magnify, every thing, which seems to promise it buoyance for a moment; but as the drowning man sinks in spite of straws, so will anti-masonry sink into its deserved obscurity, in spite of its desperate grapplings; and the current of public affairs will flow as smoothly as if it never had ruffled the surface.

What those elected hope to do, beyond getting three dollars a day of the people's money, and spending them in licentious pursuits, we shall not pretend to say; but it is not a difficult matter to mention a few things which, in all probability they will not do: they will not disfranchise the masonick fraternity, nor succeed in passing any laws by which their civil or political rights shall be in any manner abridged; they will not succeed in establishing anti-masonry as the quintessence of all excellence, nor in proving that those who oppose it are necessarily egregious scoundrels—they will not succeed in proving that the masonick institution had any thing to do with the kidnapping of Morgan, or, if he be dead, with his murder; nor in demonstrating that either was encouraged or sanctioned by masonick obligations; in short, there is no reason to believe that they will be able to re-kindle the excitement by legislative aid, or to procure enactments against the best and most public spirited citizens in the state, merely because they happen to be freemasons; but there is every reason to believe that they will follow the example of their impotent predecessors, and lounge through the session, without either the ability to benefit their faction, or the desire to promote the interests of the state. Anti-masonry, then, can expect nothing from them, and the friends of toleration have as little to fear. A farce will be got up, at which all but the actors will smile, and which, unlike similar scenes at the play-house, will bring contempt upon the Merry Andrews, in the proportion that they contribute to the public amusement.

THE ALBANY THEATRE, which had been closed for some weeks, for the purpose of undergoing repair, and receiving an extra finish from the pencil of a skilful and meritorious artist, was opened for the winter season, on Monday evening last. The interior of the building is indeed brilliant, and it has been said, and repeated, that it equals, if it does not surpass, any place of the kind in the country. As far as our knowledge goes, we without hesitation, subscribe to the same opinion. We shall not, however, anatomize it, nor attempt to describe its effects upon our dazzled and astonished optics. In these matters it is best for every one to judge for himself—they are cases in which the Paul Pry faculties of every individual may be put in motion, without the danger of subjecting him to the imputation of "intruding." We therefore advise the curious to "drop in."

Previous to the play on Monday evening the following Address, written by JAMES LAWSON, Esq. of New-York, was spoken by Mr. FORREST, with his usual energy and correctness:

In earliest days, when, uncontrolled by art,
Each chainless passion of the human heart,
Through every grade of cruelty and crime,
Held sovereign sway, unchecked by law or time;
When Guilt uprose, with dark, malignant frown,
To grasp from Virtue's head her spotless crown;

And mad Ambition marched with giant strides
O'er wasted war-fields, and with human tides;
When ruthless Vengeance, and unbloody Hate,
Stalked through the world to blight and desolate;
When Vice and Superstition marked the age,
The scene was Mankind—the Earth, the Stage!

In later times, when sons of Genius rose,
Of murder, rapine, and revenge, the fires,
The stage was then the grove, or sylvan green;
The only actors on the tragick scene
Were the rude sons, to ruler fathers born,
Whose wit and satire held up vice to scorn,
And mimicked deeds of heroes and of kings,
In their unwritten, crude imaginings.

But brighter days came on, and lustre threw
On History's page, for future age to view:
In Greece, the pride and pattern of the world,
The tragick Muse her standard first unfurled;
Euphorion's son struck his enchanting lyre,
In notes that waked Euripides' fire;
And then his rivals, who, in song or field,
Proved both his country's glory and his shield.
Then lived the Comick too, whose wit refined
Was felt, obeyed, the aristocracy of mind:
Next Rome, the haughty Empress of the earth,
Her sons immortal, as of heavenly birth,
Caught the sweet sounds the Grecian lyre awoke,
And in undying strains her Drama spoke:
Then swarthy Carthage sent her banded son,
Who for Thalia's crown both strove and won.

But Time rolled onward—the dark ages fled;
Long slumbering Genius woke, as from the dead;
The Drama shed its radiance o'er mankind,
And roused the world from apathy of mind;
The Stage—the Avon-Swan's immortal verse,
Held—holds in magic thralls the Universe!

The Stage: the light of innocence and truth,
The scourge of vicious age, the friend of youth;
The Stage! vast field, where stormy passions pass
In bold review, as in a present glass;
The Stage! where Virtue her fair form may see,
And Vice shrink back before his own deformity.

Patrons! once more our portals open wide,
Your smile our hope, your favour still our pride;
The Drama here shall dignify the Stage,
Amuse, instruct, while it amends the age.

Through the week the house has been well attended and the plays well sustained. Our leisure will not allow us, this week, to dwell upon the merits of the various actors. In general terms, the company is an excellent one; and as the enterprising managers promise a regular succession of "stars," we anticipate a brilliant campaign. Miss EMERY made her first appearance on Thursday evening, in the character of Bianca; and Mrs. STONE, an old and deserved favourite, is announced for Helen Macgregor, in the performance of this evening.

EMIGRATION TO HAYTI. Mr. BENJAMIN LUNDY, senior editor of the Genius of Universal Emancipation, some months since paid a visit to the island of Hayti, to obtain a settlement for twelve emancipated slaves, and to investigate the condition of emigrants generally, from this country. The result of his visit was highly satisfactory to himself, and the account of his investigations, which he has published, places the black republic in a much higher state of civilization than it has hitherto occupied in the opinion of the rest of the world. At the close of his essays on the "state of things in Hayti," Mr. Lundy makes known the following liberal proposals of several settlers upon that island.

1. General Inginac, who possesses several very fine plantations, a short distance from Port au Prince, offers to hire, immediately, a large number of labourers, (both men and boys,) to whom he will give from five to twelve dollars per month, and furnish each family gratis, a comfortable house to live in, and a lot of ground with it, sufficient for a garden, with the privilege of raising poultry, &c. &c. while they continue in his employment. After working in this way for one year, he will lease land to all who may be capable of managing well, and shall then be disposed to settle in that manner.

2. Senator Bayard has a valuable plantation near the town of Jacmel, whereon a large quantity of cane is already planted. He offers to advance the price of passage and furnish three months' provisions to emigrants, on a long credit; provide houses for them to live in, with garden lots gratis; give them medical aid, if necessary, and let them have the half of all the sugar and syrup they can make, from the cane thus ready planted, deducting a small portion for expenses in keeping the works, &c. in repair. In fifteen days from the time they commence their labours, they would realize the benefit thereof; and proper industry would be rewarded with a very handsome profit. The plantation has every thing in readiness to carry on the business, so that the emigrants would incur no expense in procuring working tools, &c.

3. William Doran, an Englishman, who also possesses several sugar estates near Jacmel, one of which is admitted by intelligent men to be the best, in every respect, that can be found in all the West Indies, wishes to engage one hundred or more labourers, immediately, to whom he offers the following terms:—

He will associate them with him for six or nine years—they having the privilege of renewing the contract; pay one-fifth of the price of their passage; furnish them with suitable provisions for six months; medical aid if necessary—for which each family will pay two dollars a year; a building lot, with half an acre of ground for a kitchen garden, gratis; pay one hundred dollars a year towards employing a schoolmaster, who may at the same time be a minister of the gospel, of their own persuasion; and give them one-fourth of the sugar and syrup, made from cane already planted, and one-half of all other productions raised by them, exclusive of those of their private gardens, &c. &c. The sum he is willing to advance, for each person, between fifteen and forty-five years of age, (which must not exceed sixty dollars,) he will expect to be paid by installments, at remote periods, the first of which will be called for at the end of their second year's labour.

This gentleman also proposes a splendid project for the removal and settlement of slaves from the United States, in addition to the foregoing which will shortly appear in the columns of the Genius of Universal Emancipation.

4. William Deas, a very respectable emigrant, from Charleston, South Carolina, offers to employ a considerable number of his coloured brethren from the United States, on the following terms:—

He has six hundred dollars for planting with cane, and attending each piece, until fit to cut—one hundred and twenty dollars to be paid when the planting is done; forty dollars, after the first hoeing; forty dollars, after the second; and the balance, when the cane shall have come to maturity. Should necessity require, however, he would make further advances. He will also lease, upon very favourable terms, portions of his land to those who are prepared to settle and cultivate the same. He has a tract of 4000 acres, situated directly on the sea coast, with sugar works erected thereon. The land is equal in fertility to any perhaps in the world. This tract formerly produced a vast quantity of sugar, coffee, &c. &c.

5. Folson and McCulloch, of Jeremie, the first of which is an Englishman of very good character and standing, wish to employ one hundred labourers, at a sugar plantation, as soon as possible. They propose to pay each labouring man fifty cents per day; (women and children that work, in proportion,) furnish a house and one acre of ground for a garden, to each family, with the privilege of keeping poultry, hogs, &c., and give them medical aid, if sick. They will engage them upon these terms, for nine years; and, if desired, give security for the complete fulfilment of their part of the contract.

6. General Marion, of Aux Cayes, offers to men of capital a sugar estate, now in ruins, on which may be employed at least a hundred labourers. Terms, moderate; all advances to be refunded at a certain period; besides allowing a share of the profits; and the property to be considered as security for the same.

7. Citizen Labastille, of Aux Cayes, has a coffee plantation, consisting of three hundred acres, on which there are now about one hundred thousand coffee trees, ready planted, which he estimates to produce with little care, from one to four pounds each. He will lease it for nine years, if fifty labourers can be engaged to work said plantation, he will let them have the use of it two years gratis; the third year they will pay him one-tenth, and the remaining seven years, one-fifth of the produce.

The undersigned, senior editor of the Genius of Universal Emancipation, is authorized to attend to the making arrangements for closing contracts with any of the persons named as above, upon the terms mentioned. For further information, application may be made to him or his partner. They may be consulted at any time, at their office, No. 19 South Calvert street, or their boarding house, at No. 135 Market street, Baltimore. B. LUNDY.

W. C. LITTLE, 67 State street, is agent in this city and vicinity, for the JOURNAL OF HEALTH, the prospectus of which was published in our last.

We have received the first and second numbers of the New-York Palladium, published at West Troy, by Mr. ANSEL WARREN. It is neatly printed, and is conducted with considerable ability. We heartily wish its industrious proprietor the greatest success.

The third number of The Partisan, from which we have this week extracted a tolerable sentimental affair, is embellished with a full length portrait of the editors better half—she resembles the Flying Dutchman as much as any thing we know of.

An Anti Masonick Dagger. We were furnished on Friday evening last with a scrap of paper containing the following words from the pencil of one of Avery Allyn's companions, who left here a day or two ago with that juggler, for the purpose of exhibiting, as is said, in Woodstock.

"Mr. Butzer—Sir, I left a Grecian dagger under my pillow on Wednesday evening. I wish you would give it to Mr. Fish—and oblige yours, E. E. CAMP."

And has it come to this, that in a land of equal laws and rights—among a christian people in a state of profound peace—the cause of anti-masonry is of so heinous a nature that it cannot be propagated but by armed ruffians! We have seen this Grecian dagger, well sharpened and ground to a point; and it made us shudder to think that the owner of it was a favoured conductor of John Bogardus, Jacobus Lefever, Solomon E. Eltinge, and other politicians of that camp in Ulster. If a freemason were to travel about in this manner for the purpose of refuting the calumnies heaped upon him by miscreants like Allyn and Camp, the country would be made to ring with denunciations from the farthest tip of the stick.

Canal of the Pyrenees. A magnificent canal is about to be commenced in France, connecting the Atlantic and Mediterranean, by running 300 miles, its breadth is to be about seventy feet, and its depth about eight inches. Its summit level is to be about 1300 feet above the sea, requiring 276 locks. Each lock will have a breadth of twenty-two feet, and a length of 114 feet. It is calculated for keeled vessels of 150 tons, and the expense is estimated at about six millions of dollars.

Don Miguel. A correspondent of the Daily Advertiser says:—"That according to the late news, the kingdom of Angola, in Africa, one of the most valuable and extensive possessions of Portugal, has thrown off the yoke of Miguel, and proclaimed D. Maria II.; and in this revolt in favour of the proper authorities, one life only, it seems, was lost—that of the Governor, for opposing the public will." [N. Y. Statesman.]

Don Miguel's Ministers. The persons, sent as envoys to represent Don Miguel at the court of St. James and at Rome, have not been acknowledged; but the courts of St. Petersburg and Berlin, says the London John Bull, "have admitted ministers from that humane and honourable prince."

Liberia. In a note to the short address of Bishop White, &c. is a most interesting fact, and one full of promise. It states that the Colonists have established friendly relations with so many of the neighbouring Chiefs, that they have sent into Liberia as many as a hundred of their children to be educated.

Capitalization of General Barradas confirmed. A passenger in the Louisiana, who arrived at New-Orleans on the 7th, from Vera Cruz, informs us that General Barradas came to N. Orleans in the same vessel with himself, together with several of his officers, for the purpose of chartering transports, to take his men from Tampico to Havana. General Barradas capitulated on the 12th of September, after five successive engagements, having lost nearly half his men by the combined operation of sickness and the Mexican arms.

SCHOOL BOOKS published by E. & G. MERRIAM, Brookfield, Mass. and for sale by O. STEELE, Bookseller, No. 437 South Market street.

THE AMERICAN READER, containing extracts suited to excite a love of Science and Literature, to refine the taste, and to improve the moral character. Designed for the use of Schools. Price 75 Cents.

Recommendations. Having examined the "American Reader," recently published by E. & G. Merriam, of Brookfield, we cordially recommend it, as a School Book to be used by higher classes in common schools. It contains a judicious, chaste, and valuable selection of pieces from standard writers. The moral tendency of the selection we consider highly salutary. While it is calculated to assist the pupil in acquiring the art of reading, it will also furnish him with most valuable hints in regard to the formation of character. The merits of this compilation, when known, will, we think, secure for it extensive patronage.

Letter to the Compiler.

Hadley Nov. 25, 1828.

Dear Sir,

I have examined the copy of the American Reader you sent me. The selection of the materials appears to be judicious, and I think it possesses merits superior to any work of the kind which has fallen under my observation.

GEO. NICHOLS.

Preceptor of Hopkins Academy.

From the Massachusetts Yeoman. "The American Reader is a handsomely printed duodecimo. It is the greater part of it, a collection of elegant extracts from some of the best English and American writers, in prose and poetry. Many of the pieces are of very recent publication, giving to the book an interest which is wanting in some other similar works. We think it will be found exceedingly well adapted for the use for which it is designed. It is certainly an interesting miscellany for families, and even for literary readers."

From the Boston Recorder. "The character of the book may be estimated by the writers chosen by the compiler. Among the European are Jane Taylor, Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Opie, H. K. White, Montgomery, B. Barton and Pollok. Among the American are W. Irving, Dennis, Webster, Griffin, Whippley, Wayland, Dwight, Humphrey, Wilcox, Beecher, Willis, Mrs. Sigourney and Miss Francis. The whole comprises a very judicious and chaste selection."

From a Notice of the Work. "This compilation, in point of moral sentiment, is, in our judgement, superior to any recent publication which we have seen. We recommend the work to the early consideration of School Committees, and hope it may be extensively circulated."

It is an easy introduction of the young mind to an acquaintance with some of the principles of science, which is calculated to give a relish for learning, which can never be lost. A copy of this little work of 100 is in the hands of every child between four and eight years of age. It deserves to be introduced into all our primary schools, and to be as deeply engraven on the memory of every scholar."

From the Massachusetts Yeoman. "We have felt the need, in our own family, of just such an 'Assistant' as this little work. It is designed, by questions and answers, to impart to the inquisitive minds of young children, a knowledge of facts important to be understood by them, and fitted to excite the curiosity to know more. With such a book at hand, many a leisure moment may be passed pleasantly to the parent and profitably to the gratified children."

THE BROKEN HEART.

BY GEORGE LUNT.

I knew the story of a broken heart;—
A sad tale 'twas, and such an one as some
Of austere brow and cold mysterious eye
Might scarcely deign to hear, or hearing it,
Would gravely smile and then, with solemn air
Shaking the doubtful head, turn back to dust:—
But haply some may learn from it that sadness
By which the heart grows better, for the tear
That falls for woe doth ever purify
The soul that sent it, and returns again
A flood of peace sweet as a seraph's prayer.

They loved,—or thought they loved, for cunningly
Doth the arch god rivet an iron chain
Around one neck, nor lets the sufferer see
How light he wreathes the silken thread that joins
His mated slave to the eternal yoke.
She was a blessed creature;—one may live
From blushing boyhood down to hoary age,
And only once in that long waste of years
Could such a vision come, but never more
To be forgotten:—not the wanton flowers
Laughed to the sunbeam half so gay as she;
The sweet south-west on wings of fragrant gladness
Lingered and sighed at her sweet rivalry:
She was the very dream to light the life
Of a boy-poet in his passionate hour:
There never came a thought, when she was by,
That time would ever ask her to give up
One single sparkle of her glorious eye;
That there was such a thing as time, or death,
Or that one little silken tress of her's
Would ever droop down in the cold, cold dust.

And could she love that strange and moody man,
Who walked among his kind companionless,
A dreamy wayward man?—Her lightest word
Could win him back from musing melancholy;
And when at times a saddening power passed
Along his pale broad brow, and quenched awhile
His eagle-spirit, she would wreath again
Her fairy fingers in his raven locks
And he would kiss her cheek, and smile on her:
She was his hope,—his own,—and without her
Himself had been as nothing. Hand in hand
Up the broad hills together had they climbed
And seen the sun, the glorious summer sun
Unfold the violet's petals; they had stood
Upon the moonlight lea, and day by day,
As that mysterious sadness which partakes
Of such deep joy as nature's communings
Alone can give, stole o'er them, they had wept
The tears that sanctify and bless; together
Had bowed their spirits, and with their pure prayers
Adored high Heaven. What lack they more? They loved:—
O, may not love like this forever mock
At Time and Change and Fate?

Solemn and sad
The cold east wind sweeps by the russet oaks,
And the green liveried forests have put on
Their bridal hues, purple and verdant gold;—
Their bridal to decay: solemn and sad
The cold east wind hath swept o'er her; she too
Makes ready her bridal vestiture,—is she ready
To marry with the grave? O, who that saw
So very fair and beautiful a thing
Lingering thus frail upon the verge of life,
Would marvel if her next low gentle prayer
Should waft her up to paradise? Yet all,
Even to the last, had hope, but still wept on
They scarce knew why: but when the trembling leaves
Dropt from the parent boughs,—and a faint shudder
And a tremulous flush, and in her eye
A most unearthly brightness came and passed,
And she lay there, voiceless and soulless now,
Lovelier than thought, with her bright golden hair
Glimmering amid the violet veins that rose
Upon her holy brow,—you would suppose
They had not deemed of this, so utter was
Their tearless agony.

Far, far away,
Over the wide blue waters long and lone
Roamed that heart-stricken man, nor found he rest,
Nor peace, nor hope, and now he came to die
In his own land. The white sails filled,—away!
The good ship cleaves the created billows free,
Yet his heart felt no bounding spring of joy.
From morn to night his idle eye was fixed
Upon the idle wave, save when at times
The westward heaven grew gladdened with the joy
Of the perpetual sun, and then with arms
Outspread, and eyes agaze would he look long
And wistfully towards that far distant land.

But when the moaning billows roused themselves,
And the pale sickly sun adown the west
Glared white upon the ghastly sea and 'mid
Shrill flying ropes the piping sea-winds shrieked
Till grey-beard sailors shook their hoary heads;
Then he would smile, not proudly nor in scorn,
But as if he had hoped,—had prayed for Death,
And now would hail him a Deliverer. On
The fast ship sends her course, and now he stood
On his own native shore, nor waited he
For welcome or for greeting, till he lay
Along her grave who died, among bright flowers,
Ripe honey-suckle and sweet fairy cap;
And all night long did the cold faithless moon
Shower dew on him,—and laughing morn rose up
As fresh and fair as at young Nature's birth,—
But it was not for him.

FRIENDLY ADVICE.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

Go not in Glory's ways—
Seek not from Fame her unsubstantial dower;
Seek not the sunshine of terrestrial power;
Not to the light that plays
Around ambition's shrines lift up thine eye—
They perish in thy grasp, and thou wilt die!
Turn ye from Glory's ways.

Seek not the minstrel's meed—
Gaze not upon the blue and lonely skies.
Not on the morns that wane—the suns that rise,
The streams that, flashing, speed;
Not on the seasons in their sudden change,
Nor death—for death is never very strange,
Tis but the minstrel's meed!

But bear to earth, and cling
With constant purpose to its worthiest lot,
Despoil young pride—its wing may aid thee not,
Bear on it, ere it sting
Poison the breast that nursed it—and look well
To the main chance—so shall thy pleasure tell,
With joy thy heart's chords sing.

Yon brave old oak—see thou!
With a strange strength it bears against the storm,
It clung to earth, and thus it reared its form,
Unapt in years to bow;
Be thus thine energies aimed—to God—to earth,
Heedless of else that hath a living birth
Time past, to come, or now!

CHAMOMILE TEA.

Let doctors, or quacks, prescribe as they may,
Yet none of their nostrums for me;
For I firmly believe—what the old women say,
That there's nothing like chamomile tea.

It strengthens the mind, it enlivens the brain,
It converts all our sorrow to glee,
It heightens our pleasures, it banishes pain—
Then what is like chamomile tea?

In health it is harmless—and say what you please,
One thing is still certain with me,
It suits equally well with every disease;
O, there's nothing like chamomile tea.

In colds or consumptions, I pledge you my word,
Or in chills, or in fevers, d'ye see,
There's nothing such speedy relief will afford,
As a dose of good chamomile tea.

Your famed panacea, spiced rhubarb, and stuff,
Which daily and hourly we see
Cracked up for all cures, in some newspaper puff,
Can't be puffed into chamomile tea.

The cancer and cholick, the scurvy and gout,
The blues, and all evils d'esprit,
When once fairly lodged, can be only forced out,
By forcing in chamomile tea.

You all know the story how Thetis's son
Was dipped to his heel in the sea;
The sea's all a farce—for the way it was done,
He was hardened by chamomile tea.

Or if dipped in the Styx, as others avow,
Which I also deny, by the powers—
The Styx it is plain, must in some way, or how,
Have been banked up with chamomile flowers.

When sentenced to die, foolish Clarence, they say,
Met his fate in a but of Malmsey,
He'd have foiled the crooked tyrant, and lived to this day,
Had he plunged into chamomile tea.

Let misses and maidens in tea table chat,
Sip their hyson and sprightly bohea;

It may fit them to scold, or to scold to sing as they,
But its nothing like chamomile tea.

Let tipplers and spendthrifts to taverns resort,
And be soaked in their cups cap-a-pie;
Then champagne and tokay, their claret and port,
Are poison, to chamomile tea.

Why the nectar the gods and their goddesses quaff,
In potations convivial and free,
Though Homer mistakes it—nay, pray do not laugh,
I suspect it was chamomile tea.

Then fill up your goblets, and round let them pass,
While the moments and hours they flee;
And let each gallant youth pledge his favourite lass,
In a bumper—of chamomile tea. D. P. B.

WHAT I HATE.

I hate the toothache, when, with maddening jumps,
Like torrent wild it raves among the sumps;
I hate the whole dire catalogue of aches,
Distempers, fevers hot, and ague shakes.

I hate mad dogs, snakes, dandies, flas, and bugs,
Tea parties, wild cats, toads, and whiskey jugs,
Hard times, bad roads, spoiled fish, and broken banks,
Stale news, cold soup, light purse, and lawyers' tanks.

I hate long stories, and short ears of corn,
A costly farm-house, and a shabby barn;
More curs than pigs, no books, but many guns,
Sore toes, tight shoes, old debts and paper duns.

I hate tight lacing, and loose conversation,
Abundant gab and little information,
The fool that sings in bed and snores in meeting,
Who laughs while talking and talks much while eating.

I hate the sot, who, grappled to my coat,
Sends forth the nasty vapours of his throat,
In senseless jargon, forcing me to smell
His stench emitting reservoir of swill.

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED. The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgments for the liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself, with the size, strength and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on theacking. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping in a parlour fire—to boarding-house keepers—to masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentes now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 123 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy. MASONICK RECORD.

ANTI-MASONRY.

The expedients of political anti-masons to deceive the people, to excite their passions, and gain power, are most extraordinary and revolting. No story is too absurd for them to fabricate, no character too sacred for them to assail, and no feelings too holy for them to outrage. The sanctity of the church, the retreat of domestic happiness, and the elevated walks of public life, are alike defiled by their rude invasions. An aged minister of the gospel, a christian and a patriot, the Rev. Mr. Clinton, of Lewis county, has recently been dragged before the public, and his good name sought to be destroyed, by the "Goths and Vandals" of this enlightened age. An anti-masonick candidate was to be elected; and to do that some "raw head and bloody bone" story must be trumped up about the masons. A vagabond mason was in jail, and of course the people would suppose he wanted to get out. An ingenious method was contrived, which, without being intended to effect his release, was calculated to injure the reputation of Mr. Clinton, and increase the excitement against masons. Some man was found of sufficiently lax morality to be induced to personate the individual in jail, and to write a letter to Mr. Clinton, claiming his assistance on the ground that he was a mason, &c. Immediately the anti-masons set up a shout of denunciation, against masonry—its demoralizing tendency, its horrid oaths; but the truth soon came to light, and the authors of the plot are experiencing a full measure of public odium. The following is the letter which the subject has drawn from the Rev. Mr. Clinton. We recommend its attentive perusal, and we ask of every individual, deliberately to ask himself, whether it is probable that a man on the verge of the grave of Mr. Clinton's probity and purity of character, of his clear and sound understanding, could, under all these circumstances, solemnly declare that he knew of nothing in the institution of masonry contrary to revealed religion; and still its principles be so vile and corrupt as they are represented by anti-masons.

[Oneida Observer]

Lowville, Oct. 21, 1829.

Whereas, a certain hand-bill lately published by the anti-masonick committee, contains a letter addressed to me, purporting to be from Wm. Myers, dated September 24, 1829, I feel it a duty which I owe to community and myself, briefly to reply. About the last of September, or early in the present month, I did receive a letter signed Wm. Myers, and am willing to say, the one published by the anti-masonick committee, though not in every particular exactly the same, is on the whole a pretty fair copy.

On perusing the letter, I thought that it carried upon the face of it evident marks that it was not the composition of Wm. Myers. Possibly it might have been copied or transcribed by him, after the original was prepared for him. I viewed it as a vile trick, a mere artifice to serve electioneering purposes; and said to my wife, "This letter smells strong of anti-masonry." I did not therefore write any answer to Myers, neither did I call to see him when passing through the village of Martinsburg. If I had supposed it came directly from Myers, I should have treated it in the same manner that I now have done. My only wish respecting him has ever been, and still is, that he may have a fair trial by the laws and jury of his country; and I believe every true mason in the country wishes the same; and I am both confident and sincere when I say, that I most firmly believe that masons would be the last class in community to aid any offender to escape public justice.

What I at first believed concerning the letter—that it was an artifice, base mean and wicked, I am now, for sundry reasons, fully confirmed in. I understand that written copies had been secretly and industriously handed about in different parts of this county, among the anti-masons, even before the one sent to me was received by me. These copies, so handed about, were accompanied with false and base insinuations and reports, viz: that the very next morning after I received the letter, I took my horse and went immediately to see Myers. The truth is, I have not seen him to this day. It has also been whispered about that the masons were contriving a plan to help Myers out of jail.

Let me here ask a question. How came the anti-masons in possession of a copy of that letter? Did Myers really write the letter and seal it, as they say, with two seals, for the sake of great secrecy, and deliver it to a trusty person to give to me? Then they must fraudulently have broken the seals, and taken a copy. But when the letter came the seals were whole, and had not the least appearance of having been broken. The only just, fair, and I think undeniable conclusion is, that they prepared the original, and persuaded Myers to transcribe it, sign his name to it, and forward it to me.

I would now ask another question. Is it not undeniable evidence of a bad cause, when men will resort to tricks, to artifice and falsehood, to support it? I have myself ever been of the opinion that "honesty is the best policy." The conduct of the committee towards me, as an individual, is certainly ungentlemanly, and merits my hearty contempt; towards community, I think it a highhanded imposition, which will merit and receive their contempt also.

I further observe that there are sundry false insinuations in that letter concerning masonick obligations; I will particularly notice this expression—"By our obligations we are to assist each other out of all trouble." But masons are under no obligations to assist each other to escape justice. It is also very often asserted and reiterated, that masons are bound, especially in the higher degrees, to assist each other and keep each other's secrets, murder and treason not excepted. Now I am willing to own that I have taken eight degrees in masonry; but I do declare, and I have reason to believe, that the candid and unprejudiced part of community, who have known my life and conversation, will believe, that I have never taken any obligation, nor has any ever been offered me, nor have I ever known that any mason ever took an obligation which was incompatible with the best rights and privileges of citizens, the nature and ends of civil governments, or the purest principles of revealed religion.

While I am writing, I will mention some other things: It has been reported that masons have assisted masons to escape from justice—that they did actually help Luke Winchell out of jail. The truth is this—the first judge, Silas Stow, esq. with the consent of the district attorney, Ela Collins, did admit Luke Winchell to bail, and Charles Bush was the bail; but neither of them was a mason. The report is also circulated, that about sixteen years ago, a mason informed one Secom, of Denmark, that he was about to be apprehended for robbing the mail, and advised him to run away. The truth, as I am well informed, is this: that no one advised him to run away, but general Dickinson, (who, by the way, is not a mason) did say to Secom—"You will be apprehended for robbing the mail, and if you are innocent, stand your ground." Secom absconded.

And further—a gentleman in high office, I am told, has said that a mason ought not to hold any office, nor sit upon a jury, nor be admitted as a witness; in a word, he said that every mason ought to be proscribed, or disfranchised; and when this was charged upon him, as being inconsistent with the principles of equal rights and privileges, he was wicked enough to deny that he had ever uttered such words; but fortunately for community, though unfortunately for him, it has, as I understand, been proved by creditable witnesses that he did utter the sentiments before mentioned.

Fellow citizens, permit me for a moment to call your attention to the spirit and design of anti-masonry. In an address of Elder Solomon, approved by the anti-masonick meeting, and directed to be published, you find words to this effect—"The sons of the day [anti-masons] shall hold every office, from a path-master's to the president, then shall a law go forth, like that of the Medes and Persians, declaring vengeance to secret societies." Is this consistent with equal rights and privileges? When, in the revolution, I often jeopardized my life, in the militia, at the call of my country, and in sundry instances charged the enemy even to the cannon's mouth, did I expect to live to see a generation rise up who would disfranchise me, and much better than myself, too? But so it is, persecution is relentless, and has no respect to age—is regardless of benefits, and has no gratitude—uses unhallowed means to accomplish its purposes, and therefore knows no justice. "Consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds." ISAAC CLINTON.

KILWINNING.

Kilwinning, a town of Scotland, in Ayrshire, is seated near the Garroch, five miles N. N. W. of Irvine. It is noted for being the seat of the first mason Lodge in Scotland. This was established about the middle of the 12th century, by the architect and masons who came over from the continent to assist in the building of the famous monastery which was erected here. It was founded in 1140, by Hugh de Moravia, Lord of Cunningham, for monks of the Tyronensian order and dedicated to St. Winnig. It was destroyed at their reformation, and the only entire remains of this monastery, are some vaults, a gable and a tower, on which a spire has been lately erected.

I-COLM-KILL.

When in the year 565, St. Columbo landed at I-Colm-Kill, it was called "Inish Druinish"—"the Island of the Druids"—he received the property of the Island from the Pictish monarch, whom he had converted to christianity. St. Columbo with his followers the Culdees (Chaldeans,) [these Culdees continued a distinct order of regular clergy to the 14th century and retained their original manners and doctrines,] established the college or monastery of Iona, which formerly was possessed of a valuable library, which has been destroyed or lost. Boethius relates that Fergus II, who assisted the Goths under Alarick at the sacking of Rome, brought away as part of the plunder, a chest of manuscripts, which he presented to this monastery; and in former times the archives of Scotland and valuable papers were kept here, of these, many no doubt were destroyed at the reformation; but many, it is said, were carried to the Scots college at Douay in France, and the Scots college at Rome; and it is hoped that some valuable papers may yet be discovered. Many ruins of monastic buildings and Druidical edifices can yet be traced. After christianity, by the arrival of Columbo and his followers, in Iona, in 565, was diffused throughout the northern parts of Scotland, this Island became a seat of learning and piety. In time it rose to be the head of the christian church in Scotland—whether the young princes of Scotland and Northumberland were sent for instruction; and it was also honoured with frequent visits from the neighbouring potentates of ancient times: while others sought an asylum here from the cares of the world. In the course of the ferocious wars, however, which distinguished that barbarous age, it was frequently plundered both by the Picts and by the Danes. From about the 12th or 13th century, its importance began to decline; and during the rage of the reformation most of its precious relics were destroyed, so that it is now covered with the ruins of its departed grandeur. Since this period, the island has become the property of the Duke of Argyll, and great pains have been taken by this family to preserve the venerable remains of antiquity still remaining on the island from any further dilapidation.

Extract from a book of Architectura, by Mr. Stephen Rion, of Canterbury, a very scarce work:

The holy war gave the Christians, who had been there, an idea of the Saracen works, which were afterwards imitated by them in the west, and they refined upon it every day, as they proceeded in building churches. The Italians (among whom were some Greek refugees) and with them the French, German and Flemings, joined into a fraternity, procured papal bulls for their encouragement, and particular privileges: they styled themselves Free Masons, and ranged from nation to nation, as they found churches to be built, (for very many in those days were every where in building) through the piety of multitudes, their government was regular, and where they fixed near a building, they made a camp of hills, a surveyor governor in chief, and every tenth man was called a warden, and overlooked each nine. The gentlemen of the neighbourhood, either out of charity, or commutation of penance, gave the materials and carriage, and hence were called Accepted Masters. It is admirable with what economy, and how soon they erected such considerable structures.

DANGERS OF MASONRY!

At the late "Public Meeting in Boston," to investigate the subject of freemasonry, the following resolves, among others, was adopted:—

"Resolved, that the influence hitherto exerted by masonry, in controlling the public press, and preventing a fair expression of public sentiment in relation to masonick subjects, exhibits in a strong light the dangerous character of the institution and its alarming power."

All feelings that are engendered by powerful excitement, will always, by the deliberate and reflecting part of community, be considered as the offspring of distempered minds;—and a stronger or more indubitable evidence of this fact can scarcely be found, than is contained in the above resolve. What control, we ask, has masonry hitherto had over the publick press? We have been familiar with the principles of the institution for many years, and have been intimately acquainted with a large number of its members in various sections of the country, not only during seasons of general tranquility, but during periods of the greatest political excitement which have occurred for the last quarter of a century; yet we have never, in a single instance, known or thought of any controul being exerted by the masons over the public press, either in the capacity of a society, or by individual members of it. If they who, in the heat of a misguided zeal, have not found all the presses at liberty to be employed in the promulgation of abuse and falsehood, designed to injure one of the best institutions ever formed by man, must the public press be proscribed for that very independence which constitutes its value and glory? A large number of presses have been prostituted to the vilification of masonry; and because others, which are under the direction of men of principle and integrity, cannot be controlled by men destitute of both, must they be denounced as corrupted organs or servile hirelings? Let the enemies of masonry establish as many presses as they please, and publish to the world what they please; but let them not with impunity hurl their anathematical resolves at the public press, because they who controul it possess sufficient independence to pursue an honourable course.

The "power" of masonry is known to be great, but it never was known to be "alarming"—unless, indeed, its being a barrier to oppression and tyranny may be alarming to political disorganizers and cruel despots. If the principles and effects of masonry were not the reverse of what its calumniators have represented, its power has long been sufficient to produce the consequences which some seem so much to dread. But the object of masonry is to build up, not to pull down; to increase the happiness of mankind by inculcating social harmony and equitable sentiments, not to diminish it by assuming a prerogative which none can justly claim; to cast a panoply round the shrines of civil and religious liberty, not to jeopard the one or pollute the other by the unprincipled and unhallowed exercise of power never delegated to man.

HEALTH.

SURE METHOD OF IMPROVING HEALTH &c.

BY A PHYSICIAN.

It is well known that horses which are to run a race, and men who are about to contest in boxing, or in battle, are always previously trained for the purpose of gaining wind and strength; and it is equally well known, that, during this process of training, they become in reality much more powerful, and astonishingly improve in health. I have nothing to do here with training or running a race, or fighting a battle; but it is reasonable to suppose that a process which is universally found of so much service to the bodies of men and animals, when resorted to for the purposes of public contest, would be of equal advantage when employed with a view of promoting the general health and strength in persons following the ordinary pursuits of mankind; and as experience has fully realized this expectation, I think it cannot fail to be beneficial to my readers to explain the art of training for health.* Indeed, training mainly consists in combining the most correct diet with daily vigorous exercise in the open air; and therefore the present section will present, at one view, and in a small space, that diet and regimen which is most powerfully influential both in the preservation and restoration of health.

The art of training for health consists, then, in resorting with steadiness to a correct use of solid and liquid food, exercise, air, and sleep, a little preparative medicine being also generally necessary.

1. PREPARATIVE MEDICINES. In the commencement of training, it is, for the most part, desirable to take a gentle emetic of from 16 to 20 grains of ipecacuanah powder, in water, and in two days after a mild purge, for which purpose I think there can hardly be any thing superiour, in this instance, to two grains of calomel, and five grains of compound extract of colocynth, made into a pill, and taken at bed time. Where the habit is gross, and the secretions particularly unhealthy, this pill may be advantageously repeated to the second or third time, at intervals of a week; but if these circumstances are not present, one purge will suffice. The emetic and purgative now ordered, have the effect of speedily clearing the stomach and bowels, and thus getting rid of any accumulations that may be oppressing those important organs.

2. SOLID FOOD. The diet of persons when trained must be extremely simple, consisting almost exclusively of animal food, stale bread or biscuit, and the most digestible vegetables. Veal and pork are never given, and lamb but seldom. Beef, mutton, and venison, are the chief meats. Most men will live longer on beef, without change, than on any other kind of animal food, and it is the most nourishing;* but mutton and venison are reckoned to be most easily digested. The meat must always be fresh, for if salted it would occasion indigestion and thirst. Fat, being of a greasy nature, fouls the stomach, and must be avoided; but the lean of fat meat is the best. Sometimes, for a change, fowl, rabbit, or partridge, may be allowed once a week. The legs of fowls, being very sinewy, are much approved. No fish whatever is allowed, being indigestible, and deficient in point of nourishment. No cheese is given on any account, and but very little butter, sometimes none. When a good measure of strength has been acquired, eggs may be permitted, very lightly boiled, but not more than one in the day. A little turnip, French bean, or potato, may be taken after the individual has been in training three or four weeks, or more, and the tone of the digestive organs is improved; but they must be laid aside if they create the slightest uneasiness. Soft or new bread is never given. Biscuit is very proper, and, indeed, in most instances, to be preferred even to stale bread.

Pies and puddings are never permitted, nor any kind of pastry. The only condiments allowed are, salt and vinegar. Salt may be taken in moderate quantity, but always short of producing thirst. A little vinegar, also, is not objectionable; especially when there is a tendency to corpulence.

As to the mode of dressing the animal food taken, it is far better to have it broiled than roasted or boiled, by either of which nutriment is lost, and particularly by boiling. Care should be taken not to have the meat too much done.

The quantity of solid food indulged in must be very moderate. This must, in some measure, depend on the circumstances of age, strength of the digestive powers, and nature of the indisposition present; but, as a general rule, the solid food ought not to exceed 16 or 17 ounces a day. The number of meals and times of eating must be regulated according to the principles already laid down.

3. LIQUID FOOD. It is an established rule in generally introduced instead of medicines, as an expedient for the prevention and cure of diseases, its beneficial consequences would promote his happiness, and prolong his life." [Dr. Kitchiner on Long Life.

"Our health, vigour, and activity, must depend on regimen and exercise, or, in other words, upon the observance of those rules which constitute the theory of the training process."

[Capt. Barclay on Training, p. 239.

* The following fact proves the nutritious qualities of beef. Humphries, the pugilist, was trained by Ripsham, the keeper of the jail at Ipswich. He was sweated in bed, and afterwards twice physicked. He was weighed once a day, and at first fed on beef; but as on that food he got too much flesh, they were obliged to change it to mutton.

[Sinclair's Code of Health.

training, that the less we drink, in moderation, the better; because too much liquid dilutes the gastric juice, in the stomach, (the grand agent in digesting), and encourages soft unhealthy flesh. Much drinking also promotes undue perspiration, which is weakening, if not occasioned by exercise. On no account must the quantity of three English pints, during the whole day, be exceeded, taken at breakfast and dinner, and a little after supper. In many instances, six and twenty ounces is as much as is proper. For breakfast and tea, the liquids may consist of tea or milk; and at dinner and supper, home brewed malt liquor, or wine. In training merely for strength, good old malt liquor, drawn from the cask, is reckoned the best drink at dinner and supper; but in training for health, malt liquor is not always found to agree. The patient must, in a degree, be guided by his own feelings, on this and some other points, although I believe home-brewed malt liquor will, in some cases, be found of much service, particularly after a month's close training. Jackson, the celebrated trainer, affirms, "if any person accustomed to drink wine, would try malt liquor for a month, he would find himself much better for it." Sometimes malt liquor may be advantageously taken with a toast in it. The quantity must not exceed half a pint at dinner, and the third of a pint at supper. If the person trained insists on wine, white wine is preferred to red; and two or three glasses may be allowed after dinner, but none after supper. It may be taken diluted with water, or not, as it is found to agree best.* Spirits are never permitted on any consideration whatever, not even with water. Liquor is never given before meals, unless in cases of extreme thirst. Under thirst, the liquor should never be taken in great draughts, but by mouthfuls, which quenches the thirst better, the chief object required.

No fluid is ever taken hot. The water drunk should be as soft as possible. Toast and water is very proper.†

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

ROMAN BEGGARS.

The houseless wretch, who has no other resource upon earth, is sure to escape starvation by undertaking a pilgrimage to the Holy City, in which the lucrative professions of singing, praying, and begging, are practised without intermission. There he is sure to obtain a portion of soup and bread at noon in every monastery, and the faster he can swallow his soup and run from convent to convent the more soup he will get. It is ludicrous to see the beggars every day at noon carrying their soup-jugs, and running like mad along the streets. This practice proves the want of a better system and a better police; but it is not unpleasant to reflect that there is one place on earth where the utterly poor and destitute can not perish with hunger. Here the beggar enjoys extraordinary privileges; and, however ragged and disgusting in appearance, he can enter with impunity the most brilliant Cafes when crowded with well dressed people, walk round the circle, and address his petition to each individual. A negative is usually expressed by the phrase, "Non c'e niente!" (I have nothing for you.) Should the beggar persevere, he is never harshly dismissed, but is given to understand by the words, "Iddio vi provedera!" (God will provide for you!) that he has nothing to expect. The usual formula of mendicants is, "Date qualche cosa per l'amor di dio!" (Give me something for God's sake!) and this "date qualche cosa," is eternally resounding in the ears of strangers in every quarter of Rome. Some beggars are extended on the ground, exhausted, and apparently in the very "article of death," and yet still soliciting relief from the passers. Others merely extend their palms, and withdraw them in silence when repulsed with a "non c'e niente!" Most of the Roman beggars exhibit mutilated limbs, and not a few

* In case of training for health, under any severe chronic disease, I think wine, in any quantity, is very generally inadmissible.

† Race-horses get drink twice a day only. Soft water is preferred; and it is given cold, and never hot, except during phlegm or illness. In training game-cocks, the water is got of as soft a quality as possible, and a little toasted bread is put into it, to make it still softer.

* "The advantages of the training system are not confined to pedestrians and pugilists alone—they extend to every man, and were training of them were deliberately injured in infancy by their parents, for the purpose of making them objects of charity: thus preserving them alike from the risk of want and the dreaded miseries of labour. The Romans dread the fatigue of labour more than contempt, disease, or even death itself. For every exertion exact an extravagant remuneration, and after performing the most trifling service, they complain long and grievously of the fatigue it has cost them. With this deeply rooted aversion from labour of every kind, it is not wonderful that many of them rejoice in their mutilations, and prefer the passive trade of begging to every useful occupation. So far, indeed, is this hatred of labour carried, that some mendicants do not hesitate to assign it as the ground of their claim upon your compassion. One of them, a robust young fellow, who walks about in a black coat, thus words his petition for alms, "Sono cato dalla scala di pigrezza, ed ho rotto il braccio!" (I have fallen from the ladder of idleness, and broken my arm.) Many people are so much amused with the naive sincerity of this despicable plea, that they give the fellow a trifle for his honesty in confessing a motive which most beggars endeavour to mask under deception and falsehood. A sturdy and powerful youth of nineteen, whom I see every morning on the Corso, holds out a lame, stiff hand, and shouts with the lungs of a stentor, "Non son huono per fatigare!" (I am not able to work!) "date mi qualche cosa per l'amor di dio!"

The income of these beggars bears a relative proportion to their outward infirmities. One of the most distinguished is a well-dressed, corpulent and jovial-looking man, without legs, who crawls daily about the Corso, and by merely holding out his hat, obtains a donation from almost every passer. This mendicant is so well provided for by the want of his legs, that many hundreds of the fraternity regard with envy a mutilation so obvious and so productive. Conscious of his advantages, he says it is better to be envied than pitied, looks the picture of contentment and good cheer, and discusses politics, wind, and weather, with the residents of the Corso, who regard him as a sort of neighbour. Another thriving beggar is a dwarf named Bajocco, who daily posts himself before the Grecian Coffeehouse in the Strada Condotti. Nature has been once a step-mother to this poor fellow, and yet his manifold infirmities and deformities have proved a most productive capital to him through life. In stature a dwarf, and with hands and feet strangely deformed, he appears rather a moving mass of flesh than a human being. He has nevertheless reached the advanced age of eighty-years, and calls himself the poor antique Bajocco, an epithet which falls strangely upon ears to which the usual association of the word antique is familiar.

There is also in Rome a class of privileged beggars, who rattle large copper boxes, and collect alms for the souls of the poor in purgatory, on the amount of which they receive a per centage from the monks who employ them. For this service such beggars are selected as are most disfigured by disease or mutilation, or such as, from their cadaverous appearance, look like ambassadors from purgatory, sent back to earth to plead the cause of their fellow sufferers. These ghastly objects entreat your compassion for "le povere anime benedette del purgatorio," and in tones which become more hollow and sepulchral as the day advances, until, in the evening, they are hoarse and exhausted with unceasing repetition.

According to Romish dogma, death brings no relief from suffering, and all good Catholics believe that prolonged tortures await the unfortunate soul which has left no provision on earth to purchase release. This prevalent belief readily opens the hearts and purses of the benevolent, when petitioned to remember the suffering souls of the poor, and thus the priests obtain their dues from the most destitute of the deceased poor, through the sympathy of the living. Even the poorest beggars will often bestow their last copper coin upon this work of christian charity.

Amongst the various stratagems of mendicity in Rome, one is practiced by these agents of the monasteries, which makes so powerful an appeal to the strongest feelings of human nature that it rarely fails to extort a contribution even from the most destitute. Two beggars, man and woman, place themselves at some distance from each other, and sing in hoarse and powerful voices alternate verses of a tremendous death-song, supposed to be chanted by the dead in purgatory. The aged father beseeches his surviving son, the deceased son his surviving mother, dead youths and maidens their surviving brothers and sisters, to sacrifice a small sum for the peace of their departed souls, and thereby to prove their affectionate remembrance of the dead, and their earnest desire to atone for any unkindness or neglect towards them during life. As this awful appeal to the affections and the conscience may be heard half the length of a street, there are many listeners, and amongst them not a few, who, having lost near relatives, are effectually reached by this imposing formula. There are indeed few families in Rome which have not the loss of a member to mourn for, who was either beloved during life, or became dear after death, and for whose benefit the survivors would eagerly make any sacrifice. And here is a remedy provided to meet this strongest yearning of human nature; to alleviate heart-rending sorrow; to bring healing to the wounded conscience. No zealous, warm-hearted Catholic can resist such an appeal. Windows are opened in all directions for the passage of contributions, and the mites of the poor, carefully folded in paper, are handed to the hoarse and greedy collectors, who receive them with ill concealed exultation, and drop them into their copper boxes. These huge receptacles are emptied every night into the treasury of some convent, which derives a luxurious support by thus preying upon the sympathies of bereaved and mourning relatives.

Often have I heard the hoarse voices of two collectors resounding from each end of the short street in which I reside. Their cry is, "Io sono la tua madre," &c. or "Io sono la tua sorella," &c. (I am thy mother, or I am thy sister, and suffering in purgatory.) These awful words, uttered in deep and hollow accents, which seem to issue from the tomb itself, are well adapted to call up a vivid recollection of loved and lost relations in the minds of the desolate survivors. The success of this ingenious device was never failing. I never looked out of my window without witnessing the donations of my devout neighbours to these truly privileged mendicants.

STATISTICKS, &C.

TURKEY.

STATISTICKS OF THE TURKISH EMPIRE, AND REFORMS OF THE PRESENT SULTAN.

The extent of the Ottoman empire is estimated at 47,744 square miles, of which 10,000 are in Europe. Its European population is, however, calculated in different ways. Balbi makes it 9,500,000, Hassel 10,183,000, while according to some, it is 10,600,000. Of this population hardly more than 2,271,000 are Mahometans: the rest are idolators, Jews and Christians. Of these, 3,000,000 are Greeks, 300,000 Jews, and 80,000 Armenians. The sum total of the population of Turkey in Europe, Asia and Africa, is 23,650,000 souls.

The amount of the annual revenue of the Empire, is only about 2,900,000*l.* sterling; but the expenditure of the state does not exceed £275,000*l.* The national debt, amounts to between 7 and 8 millions. The muri or revenue just mentioned, belongs to the public treasury of Turkey, there is, however, another branch of revenue, derived from presents, inheritances, the imperial domains, and certain forfeitures, which belongs to the ish hane or klaazneth, (imperial treasury.) The accumulation of this fund is said to be enormous, and each Sultan is required to add to its bulk by a given sum proportioned to the length of his reign.

Since the destruction of the Janissaries, it is impossible to estimate precisely the military force of the Turks, but before that event, the regular troops amounted to 30,000 cavalry, and 124,000 infantry, and the feudal militia was composed of 120,000 men, of whom the greater part was cavalry. The naval force amounted in 1826 to 21 ships of the line, 31 frigates, 8 corvettes, and 30 gun-boats, carrying altogether about 2990 cannons and 5300 men. This portion, however, of defensive means was crippled at the battle Navarino.

Turkey in Europe contains one town of 500,000 inhabitants, five of 50,000, twelve of 20,000, and twenty of 10,000.

The order of the Crescent was instituted by Selim III. in the year 1697, and is divided into three classes. The reigning sovereign takes the following titles: We, the Sultan, son of a Sultan Shakan, Mahomed II., Kan, son of the victorious Sultan Abdul-Hamed, by the infinite grace of the creator of the world and eternal god, and by the mediation and miraculous act of Mahomet Mustapha, chief of the prophets, whom the benediction of god preserves; servant and master of the cities of Mecca, Medina and Kudi, towards which the eyes of the whole world are turned in the time of prayer, Padishah of the great cities of Stamboul, Edrene and Bursa, whom all kings regard with envy.

The reigning Padishah, or Grand Sultan of the Ottoman Empire Mahmoud II. was born on the 30th July, 1785, and ascended the throne 28th July, 1808. He is the eighteenth generation from Osman I. the founder of his dynasty, and the 30th sovereign of that dynasty. The hereditary Prince is his eldest son, Abdul-Mechid who was born 20th April 1824. He has besides another son two years old, and four daughters.

The following are the most striking and important of the reforms which the present Sultan has introduced into his Empire. These innovations, of which we shall briefly mention the most important, prove that there is a great tendency in the Turkish Empire to new ideas, and that however we have been deceived in our estimate of the Sultan's character, the whole of his opinions accord with the present state of European civilization.

By the hatti-scherif of the 30th June, 1826, the Sultan renounced the right of confiscation, thither assumed by the Porte, of the property of all public officers condemned to suffer death.

He has reformed a number of abuses in the Ottoman marine; introduced a better system of discipline among the sailors, and taken means to ameliorate the education of Cadets in that department, as regards manœuvring and naval evolutions.

He has published a series of ordinances, having for their object the more perfect administration of the police in the capital, the determining of the rights of corporate bodies, and the affording of protection to the rajas, or subjects not Mahometan.

He has established a better arrangement for the prevention and extinction of fires. Formerly the men employed on this service were often themselves the incendiaries, or oppressed those who suffered from the fires by odious exactions and vexations, particularly the rajas.

He has likewise established better order among the street-porters, visiting with punishment all those who are disorderly.

He has erected manufactories of cloth, and of arms for the army.

He has established telegraphs on the heights surrounding the capital.

He has purchased an English steam-boat for the service of the government. It was in this vessel he embarked, when he was last absent for the space of three days from his capital. Before his time no Sultan dared to trust his person on the open sea.

He has founded a school for the education of dragomans or interpreters. The French language has already been taught in this school.

He has attempted to separate the military and civil powers, which are at present united in the persons of the Pashas. The Pashas have hitherto collected the revenues of the provinces in their government on their own account, contenting themselves with merely paying a portion into the imperial treasury, under the name of a contribution. The Sultan has tried to collect these revenues on account of the state, assigning fixed incomes to the provincial governors. The project has not, however, succeeded, having had to encounter too powerful an opposition on the part of the Pashas.

He has established military hospitals and barracks, in which order and elegance are united.

After a previous deliberation with the Muftis and Ulemas he has granted permission to medical persons to dissect human bodies after death, a thing interdicted by law.

From the London Literary Magnet.

There is a species of insects sometimes to be met with on the coast of Kent and Sussex, which has never been described in any system of etymology that I ever saw. Its form is generally very slender; it walks on its hinder legs, with a quick mincing gait; its face is narrow, pale and smooth,—though in some subjects a slight manifestation of something like whiskers may be observed; its teeth are remarkably white, and always exposed; it prattles in a dialect half French, half English; and it wears a broad leaved black French straw hat, a blue round jacket, narrow nankeens, and Spanish leather dancing pumps. These may seem very strange things for an insect to wear, but nevertheless such is the fact, and moreover it emits a strong odour of musk and eau de Cologne, especially in the morning when it first comes out of his hole. It delights to hop and flutter about among the ladies; though it is never seen with one lady alone—probably from an instinctive fear that a single lady might attempt to catch it slyly, and deprive it of its liberty. But whenever ladies congregate in groups—as on marine parades, or in public reading rooms, milliners' shops, or bazaars, it will hover about them as though it were quite enamored of their society, and yet, should a man approach the groupe to which it has attached itself; it instantly flutters away to some other groupe, just as a butterfly flutters from one flower bed to another, before the rude presence of the gardener. The ladies, generally, seem to be much pleased with it, and often employ it in various little matters. It will fetch and carry for them;—take their orders to their perfumers; skip to the master of the ceremonies about their ball tickets, read the list of arrivals from the library books to them; monopolize all the newest newspapers, and carry them to their table, whether they want them or not; hop down to the bench and enquire the way of the wind; open and shut their parasols, carry their reticules; string seed-beads; polish muscle shells; and fasten a loose sandal ribbon to perfection; in return for all which small services, they will sometimes (when they have no he creature in immediate attendance upon them,) set it astride upon a little pony and let it ride out with them “of a morning.” Gentle reader, “dost know this water fly?—If thou dost not, the state is the more gracious; for it is a vice to know him,” albeit there are many such to be found, in sheltered places, all along shore, any warm day between the beginning of July and October. I have heard some ladies caress an insect of this kind under the name of Papillon—“mon cher petit Papillon de mer!”—But I met with one at Margate, about three weeks ago, that the ladies, there, called Sipson; and a very fine one it was, only it lisped so that it could not pronounce what appeared to be its own proper name, and called itself—Thiph'n. It had got a hurt in its eye by some—but, gentle reader, with your leave, it shall tell its own tale in its own way; and then you will have a better notion of the thing than you could have by any description of mine.

It came fluttering into Bettison's library, one fine morning,—the upper library in Hawleysquare; and perceiving a bevy of belles busily exchanging their tickets for trinkets, it settled down amongst them—

Good Heavens, Sipson (exclaimed the ladies)— why do you wear that green shade over your eye?

O Mith Crippth, (it replied)—O Mith Davith!
don't athk me. 'Thipth'nth almoth't dethroyed!
O Miththith Miller—you can't conthieve—

Gracious me! conceive what!—Do tell us, there's a dear Sipson—tell us how it happen'd—are you seriously hurt?

Voila!—replied the Sipsen—lifting up its little green shade.

Good gracious what an eye!—poor Sipson!—but do tell us, there's a dear!—tell us how it was!

Why the fact ith thith:—I alwayth waiith with ciVindthor thoap you know, and yetherday morn-

* "The advantage but, when I went to bed at night, taken it away: and—

Dear me!—only think how vastly disreputable!
 “Pon my honneur it’th true”—they had taken it quite away, and put common white thoop instead of it!—Tho (query, so) I opened my thamber door, and called “Molly!—Molly thambermaid!” but nobody thpoke.

How provoking!—what uncommonly improper creatures they are at these inns!

Oh, Mith Davith you have no idea!—but you thall hear:—nobody anther'd me, and I could hear nothing but thumbody thnoring immenthly.

What, all gone to bed, I suppose?—how supremely ridiculous!

Thret erai, Mith Crippth:—though, indeed, it wath rather late, beacuthic I'd been thitting up copying that thweet keedrill for Mith Finnemore, you know. Well, I called "Molly!"—Molly thambermaid!—Molly!"—egthakly in that manner, a great many tim'th: and presently thumbody in an immenth gruff voith, thaid—"What the plague are you bawling about?" "I want my thoa!" thaid I—"thumbody'th taken away my Windthor thoa!"—"confound you, and your thoa too. Go to bed you fool!" thaid the great gruff voith. But I wath determined to perthevere—for I didn't underthand why I thud wath myself with common white thoa;—when I had a noo thquare of Windthor thoa of my own. "Molly!" thaid I again; "Molly thambermaid!—I want my thoa! I want my Windthor thoa Molly." But Molly didn't come; and I waith juth going to give it up in dethpair, when I heard a rumbling noith at the far end of the dark lobby, and—"there 'th a lump for you!" thaid the thame gruff voith, and I rethieved it thmack in my left eye!!!

Good gracious, Sipson, you dont say so!—and what was it.

Why a lump of thoap—ath I supposed; for I didn't thtop to pick it up then, but got into bed ath thoon ath porthible—tho' I could n't thleep at all, for the immenth pain of it; and thith morning my eye wath all thwell'd up ath you thee, and there wath thith great lump of thoap lying by my thamber door.

“Good gracious me!—What a wretch!—Poor Sipson! &c. exclaimed the ladies, as they examined the “lump of thoap,” to all which the Sipson responded—“Yeth—and it ith n’t Windthor thoap neither!—and there I left them.”

From "The Birth-day, and other Tales," by Elizabeth Frances Dagley.

It was the latter end of October, when the trees were nearly stripped of their leaves, and though a few autumnal flowers still lingered, the garden looked dreary and desolate; but in one sheltered corner there grew a monthly rose, and this shrub alone was fresh and blooming.

The rich colour of its opening blossoms, and the verdant green of its leaves, formed a striking contrast to the faded and withering state of the plants all around.

"What a beautiful flower is a monthly rose!" exclaimed the owner of the garden, as she gathered one of the buds, and placed it in her bosom.

As winter made its advances, the scene became still more forlorn; the bleak winds blew the few remaining yellow leaves from the branches, and but little token of life appeared in the vegetable world. Still the monthly rose looked gay; and at Christmas, when no other flower was to be seen, it still bloomed, and, amidst the branches of holly and bay, the lovely roses, as fragrant as if fanned by the soft breezes of July, and as bright in colour as if beneath the rays of a summer sun, now cheered the eye and enlivened the scene. Again its owner repeated, "What a delightful shrub is this ever-blooming rose!"

In the month of February, a few mild days gave promise of approaching spring; but soon the keen easterly winds prevailed; the earth was again hardened by frost; and the few buds that ventured to peep out were nipped by the inclemency of the season.

But the monthly rose, tender and fragile as it seemed, possessed a strength and hardiness beyond those of many plants more vigorous in their appearance; and though its leaves were falling and its buds were drooping under the severity of the weather, still the stem was of a healthy green, and its flowers, when a gleam of sunshine encouraged them to open, were as brilliant as in summer.

With the most assiduous attention did the mistress of the garden watch the growth of her favourite tree. The root was carefully earthed up, to protect it as much as possible from the cold, the decayed leaves cleared away, and the bending boughs supported.

At length the weather grew more mild and genial, and under the influence of gentle showers and warm sunbeams, the vegetable creation burst forth into life and beauty. The subject of my fable also sent forth fresh shoots, and its buds were daily increasing; but though the lady still admired her beautiful tree, it no longer possessed so much of her notice and care, for other gay and fragrant dowers appeared to share her attention and claim her admiration; and when, in the month of June, all the varieties of Flora's gay assemblage were displayed, the poor monthly rose was totally disregarded, eclipsed by her more beautiful rivals of the same species. The Burgundy rose, with its fairy flowers, so small, and yet so perfect in form; and the moss rose, pre-eminent in elegance and brilliancy, the acknowledged queen of summer; and the lovely blush rose, whose uncertain tints and delicate bloom make it even more attractive than those of a richer colour; while the damask rose, and the white one of Provence, beautifully contrasted, heightened each other's attraction.

In the midst of such splendid candidates for admiration, our poor monthly flower had little chance for attention. Her decayed blooms, instead of being cleared away, were suffered to remain, and the ground beneath was strewn with her faded leaves, the younger branches, were no longer supported, or trained into proper growth; while the blossoms opened and withered, without any one remarking their beauty or decay.

But worse than even indifference or neglect, the poor rose soon experienced contempt; for the mistress, who once cherished and loved it, now regarded the plant as unworthy of holding a place in the garden; and as she compared its fainter hues and less powerful fragrance to the rich and luxuriant flowers that bloomed around, she observed, "What a worthless shrub is the monthly rose! its blossoms scarcely open before they fall and litter the ground; and how weak its perfumes to the other roses! I wish something better grew in its place!"

But, as time passed away, again the scene changed. Even before the end of summer the roses had disappeared; and the trees now presented nothing but straggling branches, scantily furnished with leaves, half green, half brown. But though the pride of the garden was nearly over, it was yet rich in variety; for the spicy scent of the carnations now filled the air, and their gay and various tints now charmed the eye; but, when their season was over also, and after a hot and dry summer, the garden presented a parched and withered appearance. The lady was one evening walking round it, and regarding mournfully the altered aspect of what had lately been so fresh and lovely, vainly did she cast her eye on every side, in search of a flower, to keep up the remembrance of the summer gifts, which had so quickly flown, when, chancing to pass the spot where grew the neglected shrub, the verdant colour of its leaves, and the warm glow of a half-opened bud, once more attracted her regard.

"Ah!" cried she, "how foolish and ungrateful have I been to despise this beautiful shrub. It has not, indeed, all the attractive qualities of those fairer, but short-lived blossoms, for whose sake I have neglected it, but it possesses a merit far beyond theirs—it is the true friend—constant in every season."

There is nothing that requires so strict an economy as our benevolence. We should husband our means as the agriculturalist his manure, which, if he spread over too large a superficies; produces no crop, if over too small a surface, exhysterates in rankness and in weeds. [Lacon.]

Nothing is more laudible or worthy of a great man than placability. [Cicero.]

THE SEA.

BY REV. F. W. P. GREENWOOD.

and thou, majestic main,
A secret world of wonders in thyself,
Soundst stupendous praise, whose greater voice
Or bids you roar, or bids your roarings fall.

Thomson.

"The sea is his, and he made it," cries the Psalmist of Israel, in one of those bursts of enthusiasm and devotion, in which he so often expresses the whole of a vast subject by a few simple words. Whose else indeed could it be, and by whom else could it have been made? Who else can heave its tides, and appoint its bounds? Who else can urge its mighty waves to madness with the breath and the wings of the tempest; and then speak to it again in a master's accents, and bid it be still? Who else could have poured out its magnificent fullness round the land, and

"Laid as in a storehouse safe its watery treasures by!"

Who else could have peopled it with its countless inhabitants, and caused it to bring forth its various productions, and filled it from its deepest bed to its expanded surface, filled it from its centre to its remotest shores filled it to the brim with beauty, and mystery, and power! Majestic ocean! Glorious sea! No created being rules thee, or made thee. Thou hearest but one voice, and that is the Lord's; thou obeyest but one arm, and that is the Almighty's. The ownership and the workmanship are God's; thou art his, and he made thee.

"The sea is his, and he made it." It bears the strong impress of his greatness, his wisdom, and his love. It speaks to us of God with the voice of all its waters; it may lead us to God by all the influences of its nature. How, then, can we be otherwise than profitably employed while we are looking on this bright and broad mirror of the Deity? The sacred scriptures are full of references to it, and itself is full of religion and God.

"The sea is his, and he made it." Its majesty is of God. What is there more sublime than the rackless desert, all surrounding, unfathomable sea? What is there more peacefully sublime than the calm, gently heaving, silent sea? What is there more terribly sublime than the angry, dashing, raging sea? Power, resistless, overwhelming power, is its attribute and its expression, whether in the careless, conscious grandeur of its deep rest, or the wild tumult of its excited wrath. It is awful when its crested waves rise up to make a compact with the black clouds, and the howling winds, and the thunder, and the thunderbolt, and they sweep on in the joy of their dread alliance, to do the Almighty's bidding. And it is awful, too, when it stretches its broad level out to meet in quiet union the bended sky, and show in the line of meeting the vast rotundity of the world. There is majesty in its wide expanse, separating and enclosing the great continents of the earth, occupying two thirds of the whole surface of the globe, penetrating the land with its bays and secondary seas, and receiving the constantly pouring tribute of every river, of every shore. There is majesty in its fulness, never diminishing and never increasing. There is majesty in its integrity, for its whole vast substance is uniform: in its local unity, for there is but one ocean, and the inhabitants of any one maritime spot may visit the inhabitants of any other in the wide world. Its depth is sublime; who can sound it! Its strength is sublime; what fabric of man can resist it! Its voice is sublime; whether in the prolonged song of its ripple or the stern music of its roar; whether it utters its hollow and melancholy tones within a labyrinth of wave-worn caves; or thunders at the base of some huge promontory; or beats against a toiling vessel's sides, lulling the voyager to rest with the strains of its wild monotony; or dies away with the calm and dying twilight, in gentle murmurs on some sheltered shore. What sight is there more magnificent than the quiet or the stormy sea? What music is there, however artful, which can vie with the natural and changeful melodies of the resounding sea!

"The sea is his, and he made it." Its beauty is of God. It possesses it, in richness, of its own; it borrows it from earth, and air, and heaven. The clouds lend it the various dyes of their wardrobe, and throw down upon it the broad masses of their shadows, as they go sailing and sweeping by. The rainbow laves in it its many coloured feet. The sun loves to visit it, and the moon, and the glittering brotherhood of planets and stars; for they delight themselves in its beauty. The sunbeams return from it in showers of diamonds and glances of fire; the moonbeams find in it a pathway of silver, where they dance to and fro, with the breeze and the waves, through the livelong night. It has a light, too, of its own, a soft and sparkling light, rivaling the stars; and often does the ship which cuts its surface, leave steaming behind a milky way of dim, and uncertain lustre, like that which is shining dimly above. It harmonizes in its forms and sounds both with the night and the day. It cheerfully reflects the light, and it unites solemnly with the darkness. It imparts sweetness to the music of men, and grandeur to the thunder of heaven. What landscape is so beautiful as one upon the borders of the sea? The spirit of its loveliness is from the waters, where it dwells and rests, singing its spells, and scattering its charms on all the coast. What rocks and cliffs are so glorious as those which are washed by the chafing sea? What groves, and fields, and dwellings are so enchanting as those which stand by the reflecting sea?

If we could see the great ocean as it can be seen by no mortal eye, beholding at one view what we are now obliged to visit in detail and spot by spot; if we could, from a flight far higher than the sea eagle's, and with a sight more keen and comprehensive than his, view the immense surface of the deep all spread out beneath us like a universal chart, what an infinite variety such a scene would display! Here a storm would be raging, the thunder bursting, the waters boiling, and rain and foam and fire all mingling together; and here, next to this scene of magnificent confusion, we should see the bright blue waves glittering in the sun, and while the brisk breezes flew over them, clapping their hands for very gladness—for they do clap their hands, and justify by the life, and almost individual animation which they exhibit, that remarkable figure of the Psalmist. Here, again, on this self same ocean, we should behold large tracts where there was neither tempest nor breeze, but a dead calm, breathless, noiseless, and were it not for that swell of the sea which never rests, motionless. Here we should see a cluster of green islands, set like jewels, in the midst of its bosom; and there we should see broad shoals and gray rocks, fretting the billows and threatening the mariner. "There go the ships," the white robed ships, some on this course, and others on the opposite one, some just approaching the shore, and some just leaving it; some in fleets, and others in solitude; some swinging lazily in a calm, and some driven and tossed, and perhaps overwhelmed by the storm; some for traffick, and some for state, and some in peace, and others, alas! in war. Let us follow one, and we should see it propelled by the steady wind of the tropicks, and inhaling the almost visible odours which diffuse themselves around the spice islands of the East; let us observe the track of another, and we should behold it piercing the cold barriers of the North, struggling among hills and fields of ice, contending with Winter in his own everlasting dominion, striving to touch that unattained, solemn, hermit point of the globe, where ships may perhaps never visit, and where the foot of man, all daring and indefatigable as it is, may never tread. Nor are the ships of man the only travellers whom we shall perceive on this mighty map of the ocean. Flocks of sea birds are passing and repassing, diving for their food, or for pastime, migrating from shore to shore with unwearied wing and undeviating instinct, or wheeling and swarming round the rocks which they make alive and vocal by their numbers and their clanging cries.

How various, how animated, how full of interest is the survey! We might behold such a scene, were we enabled to behold it, at almost any moment of time on the vast and varied ocean; and it would be a much more diversified and beautiful one; for I have spoken but of a few particulars, and of those but slightly. I have not spoken of the thousand forms in which the sea meets the shore, of the sands and the cliffs, of the arches and grottos, of the cities and the solitudes, which occur in the beautiful irregularity of its outline; nor of the constant tides, nor the boiling whirlpools and eddies, nor the currents and streams, which are dispersed throughout its surface. The variety of the sea, notwithstanding the uniformity of its substance, is ever changing and endless.

"The sea is his, and he made it." And when he made it, he ordained that it should be the element and dwellingplace of multitudes of living beings, and the treasury of many riches. How populous and wealthy and bounteous are the depths of the sea! How many are the tribes which find in them abundant sustenance, and furnish abundant sustenance to man. The whale roams through the deep like its lord; but he is forced to surrender his vast bulk to the use of man. The lesser tribes of the finny race have each their peculiar habits and haunts, but they are found out by the ingenuity of man, and turned to his own purposes. The line and the hook and the net are dropped and spread to delude them and bring them up from the watery chambers where they were roving in conscious security. How strange it is that the warm food which comes upon our tables, and the substances which furnish our streets and dwellings with cheerful light, should be drawn up from the cold and dark recesses of the sea.

We shall behold new wonders and riches when we shall investigate the seashore. We shall find, both beauty for the eye and food for the body, in the varieties of shell fish, which adhere in myriads to the rocks, or form their close dark burrows in the sands. In some parts of the world we shall see those houses of stone, which the little coral insect rears up with patient industry from the bottom of the waters, till they grow into formidable rocks, and broad forests whose branches never wave, and whose leaves never fall. In other parts we shall see those "pale glistening pearls" which adorn the crowns of princes, and are woven in the hair of beauty, extorted by the restless grasp of man from the hidden stores of ocean. And, spread round every coast, there are beds of flowers and thickets of plants, which the dew does not nourish, and which man has not sown, nor cultivated, nor reaped; but which seem to belong to the floods alone, and the denizens of the floods, until they are thrown up by the surges, and we discover that even the dead spoil of the fields of ocean may fertilize and enrich the fields of earth. They have a life, and a nourishment, and an economy of their own, and we know little of them, except that they are there in their briny nurseries, reared up into luxuriance by what would kill, like a mortal poison, the plants of the land.

"There, with its waving blade of green,
The sea-flag streams through the silent water,
And the crimson leaf of the dulcis seen
To blush like a banner bathed in slaughter.

"There, with a light and easy motion,
The fan coral sweeps through the clear deep sea;
And the yellow and scarlet tufts of ocean
Arc bending like corn on the upland lea."

I have not told half of the riches of the sea. How can I count the countless, or describe as they ought to be described, those companies of living and lifeless things which fill the waters, and which it would take a volume barely to enumerate and name? But how can we give our minds in any degree to this subject; how can we reflect on a part only of the treasures of the seas; how can we lend but a few moments to the consideration of the majesty and beauty, the variety and the fulness of the ocean, without raising our regards in adoration to the Almighty Creator, and exclaiming with one of the sublimest of poets, who felt nature like a poet, and whose divine strains ought to be familiar with us all, "O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all; the earth is full of thy riches; so is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. There go the ships; there is that Leviathan whom thou hast made to play therein. These wait all upon thee, that thou mayst give them their meat in due season. That thou givest them they gather; thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good."

We must not omit to consider the utility of the sea; its utility, I mean, not only as it furnishes a dwelling and sustenance to an infinite variety and number of inhabitants, and an important part of the support of man, but in its more general relations to the whole globe of the world. It cools the air for us in summer, and warms it in winter. It is probable that the very composition of the atmosphere is beneficially affected by combining with the particles which it takes up from the ocean; but, however this may be, there is little or no doubt, that were it not for the immense face of waters with which the atmosphere come in contact, it would be hardly respirable for the dwellers on the earth. Then, again, it affords an easier, and, on the whole a safer medium of communication and conveyance between nation and nation, than can be found, for equal distances, on the land. It is also an effectual barrier between nations, preserving to a great degree the weak from invasion and the virtuous from contamination. In many other respects it is no doubt useful to the great whole, though in how many we are not qualified to judge. What we do see is abundant testimony of the wisdom and goodness of him who in the beginning "gathered the waters together unto one place."

There is mystery in the sea. There is mystery in its depths. It is unfathomed, and perhaps unfathomable. Who can tell, who shall know, how near its pits run down to the centre of the world? Who can tell what wells, what fountains are there, to which the fountains of the earth are in comparison but drops? Who shall say whence the ocean derives those inexhaustible supplies of salt, which so impregnate its waters, that all the rivers of the earth, pouring into it from the time of the creation, have not been able to freshen them? What undescribed monsters, what unimaginable shapes, may be roving in the profoundest places of the sea, never seeking, and perhaps from their nature unable to seek, the upper waters, and expose themselves to the gaze of man! What glittering riches, what heaps of gold, what stores of gems, there must be scattered in lavish profusion on the ocean's lowest bed! What spoils from all climates, what works of art from all lands, have been ingulged by the insatiable and reckless waves! Who shall go down to examine and reclaim this uncounted and idle wealth? Who bears the keys of the deep?

And oh! yet more affecting is the heart and mysterious to the mind, what companies of human beings are locked up in that wide, weltering, unsearchable grave of the sea! Where are the bodies of those lost ones, over whom the melancholy waves alone have been chanting requiem? What shrouds were wrapped round the limbs of beauty, and of manhood, and of placid infancy, when they were laid on the dark floor of that secret tomb? Where are the bones, the relics of the brave and the fearful, the good and the bad, the parent, the child, the wife, the husband, the brother, and sister, and lover, which have been tossed and scattered and buried by the washing, wasting, wandering sea? The journeying winds may sigh, as year after year they pass over their beds. The solitary rain cloud may weep in darkness over the mingled remains which lie strewn in that unwonted cemetery. But who shall tell the bereaved to what spot their affections may cling? And where shall human tears be shed throughout that solemn sepulchre? It is mystery all. When shall it be resolved? Who shall find it out? Who, but he to whom the wildest waves listen reverently, and to whom all nature bows; he who shall one day speak, and he heard in ocean's profoundest caves; to whom the deep, even the lowest deep, shall give up all its dead, when the sun shall sicken, and the earth and the isles shall languish, and the heavens be rolled together like a scroll and there shall be "no more sea."

THE GATHERER.

CONVERSATION.

Nature hath left man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are a hundred men sufficiently qualified for both, who, by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.

SIMPLICITY.

Major R— was not long since riding near a building which presented to his admiring gaze a fine specimen of antique Saxon architecture. Desirous to learn something respecting it, he made some inquiries of a man, who as it happened was the souter of the village. This learned wight informed the inquisitive stranger that the building in question was reckoned a noble specimen of Gothick architecture, and was built by the Romans, who came over with Julius Cæsar. "Friend," said the Major, "you make anachronisms." "No, no, Sir," replied the man, "indeed I don't make anachronisms, for I never made any thing but shoes in my life."

On the day when the news of the decease of Napoleon reached the Tuileries, Louis XVIII. was surrounded by a brilliant court, all of whom, with the exception of one man, received the intelligence with the most unequivocal signs of delight. This man was General Rapp, who burst into tears. The king perceived and noticed it. "Yes, Sire," answered the general, "I do weep for Napoleon; and you will excuse it, for to him I owe every thing in the world, even the honour of now serving your majesty, since it was he that made me what I am!" The king, in an elevated tone of voice, replied, "General, I do but esteem you the more. Fidelity which thus survives misfortune, proves to me how securely I may depend on you myself."

THE COMEDY OF LIFE.

The world is the stage; men are the actors; the events of life form the piece; fortune distributes the parts; religion governs the performance; philosophers are the spectators; the opulent occupy the boxes; the powerful the amphitheatre; and the pit is for the unfortunate; the disappointed snuff the candles; folly composes the music; and time draws the curtain.

By love's delightful influence the attack of ill-humour is resisted; the violence of our passions abated; the bitter cup of affliction sweetened; all the injuries of the world alleviated; and the sweetest flowers plentifully strewn along the path of life.

Vice needs every discouragement to prevent its seeds from growth, and it would be happy if man would consider, that he can not long enjoy health with a poisoned mind or an upbraiding conscience.

ANOTHER TIMOTHY MUNRO. Vermont, like New-York, is cursed with a horde of unprincipled fellows, to whom it affords especial pleasure at all times to disturb the peace of society; particularly, if by so doing, they can promote their personal interests. These fellows have taken up anti-masonry, as affording every facility for gratifying their Wormwood desires, and have entered upon their filthy labours with a most industrious and persevering spirit. They have enlisted in their cause all the hypocrites and blackguards in the state, and their mouth-pieces expectorate anathemas, falsehood, and billingsgate, in profusion equalled only in the "infected district." One of their recent tricks assumed so much importance as to require legislative investigation; which resulted, as every one will suppose, just as the anti-masons desired it should not result—in the discovery of the truth. The circumstances were these: a convict in the Vermont state prison at Windsor, named Joseph Burnham, died on the 15th of October, 1826, and on the 17th of the same month was taken from the prison and buried by his friends. From this simple and common-place fact, the anti-masons, just previous to the late election in Vermont, manufactured a wonderful tale about "masonick influence," "masonick oaths," &c. They asserted that Burnham was still alive, that he was a mason, and had escaped from prison through the agency of the masons—and that the burial was a sham display! By dint of telling and dwelling upon this story in their own peculiar, reckless and inflated manner, they succeeded in creating something of an excitement; and the legislature, to quiet the public mind, found it necessary to enter into an examination of the matter. This was what the mass of the people wished for; but it was not what the managers of anti-masonry wished for; and therefore, when the subject was brought before the legislature, they made an effort to have a committee appointed, "with power to send for persons and papers, and report to the legislature a year hence!" The good sense of a majority, however, rejected this plan, and it was fortunate for the tranquility of Vermont that they did so. The anties knew to what an investigation would lead, and it was for their interests to delay it and defeat it, if possible; and defeated it would have been, had they possessed the power and the time they desired to mature their schemes.

The legislature adopted a more prompt method of coming at the truth. A committee of inquiry was appointed, with the anti-masonick candidate for speaker at its head. This committee seems not to have been very desirous of promoting the ends for which it was appointed, and was subsequently discharged from the consideration of the subject, apparently without having even attempted any inquiry. Such, however, is anti-masonick love of truth, and official industry. The committees of the same nature, in the legislature of this state, were little more industrious, and their labours were no more satisfactory. They were in truth, more reprehensible than the Vermont committee, for they not only neglected to tell the truth, but wilfully perverted it.

After the discharge of the committee, three commissioners were appointed, with the same powers, to fulfil its duties. These men were neither masons nor anti-masons, and unlike their predecessors, seemed to understand the purposes of their appointment. The only proofs adduced in support of the story of Burnham's escape were two affidavits, both made by persons of questionable, if not abandoned characters, stating, that the deponents had seen Burnham in the city of New-York, after the 15th of October, 1826. Aaron B. Cutter, one of the deponents, testified that he saw Burnham, in jail, at New-York, on the 17th of October, 1826, two days after he was alleged to have died at Windsor. That Burnham was in the Vermont state prison on the 15th October, 1826, was susceptible of the most positive proof; and the improbability of his travelling a distance of two hundred and fifty miles in so short a time, and getting into jail on a process of debt, for which, it was said, he was confined, would have been sufficient to destroy the testimony of a much better man than Cutter; but independent of this, the commissioners, in their report, say, that "from the character of Cutter, they are of opinion that his statements are not entitled to credit." The only proof that remained, then, in support of the story, was the affidavit of Lyman Mower, alias Joshua Cobb, the other deponent. Mower resided in New-York; one of the commissioners therefore proceeded to that place, and found Mower, who still declared it as his belief that "he had frequently seen Burnham in the city of New-York." The commissioner then offered Mower a reward of five hundred dollars if he would produce Burnham, and promised that Burnham should be pardoned if he would return to Vermont. Mower and the commissioner immediately commenced a search, which resulted on the 24th ult. in the finding of the pretended Burnham, who, instead of being a Yankee and named Joseph Burnham, proved to be an Irishman, and named Patrick Dolon. After this discovery Mower's memory seems to have been miraculously restored to him: he suddenly and very distinctly recollected, that Dolon was an old acquaintance, and "had wrought for him on a building in New-York, in the spring of 1826!" On further inquiry it was found that Dolon had constantly resided in the city of New-York for the last six or seven years! Mower unhesitatingly made an affidavit, before a public notary, contradicting his former statements; and two gentlemen in New-York, who had known Burnham in Vermont, saw Dolon and certified that he was not Burnham. Thus ended the farce.

This affair has proved to be one of the most bare faced impositions, (and involving as much criminality as any other, excepting the Timothy Munro concern,) practiced upon the credulous multitude in the whole course of the excitement. There can be no doubt that Cutter wilfully perjured himself; and we shall not be surprised to learn that he has received pay for his villany. It turns out, too, that Burnham was not a mason. In fact, the whole story seems to have been got up without the slightest foundation, for the single, base purpose of affecting the election. The feelings of those who have figured in the anti-masouick ranks in this case, ought to be any thing but easy and enviable; and if they do not meet with universal reprehension, it will reflect sadly upon the morality of the Green Mountains.

GRAND LODGE OF NEW-BRUNSWICK. Our correspondent, in St. John, under date of the 7th inst. writes us, that a Grand Lodge was formed in that city for the province of New-Brunswick, on Wednesday the 4th of November, instant. The following are the officers:—Rev. B. G. Gray, Grand Master; D. B. Wetmore, esq., Senior Grand Warden; S. Frye, esq., M. D., Junior Grand Warden; Alexander Lawrence, Senior Grand Deacon; Thomas Nisbet, Junior Grand Deacon; John Smyth, Senior Grand Steward; W. O. Smith, Junior Grand Steward; Rev. Oliver Arnold and Rev. Jerome Alley, Grand Chaplains; James Robertson, jr., Grand Secretary; Henry Chubb, Grand Treasurer.

THEATRE Mr Roberts made his first appearance at our theatre this season, on Wednesday evening last, and we made our only appearance this week (with the exception of a few minutes) at the same place, on the same evening. The plays were Rob Roy and the Lottery Ticket—both entertaining pieces, as every one who has seen them knows, and the latter, particularly, containing a fund of merriment. Roberts sustained Bailie Nicol Jarvie in the former, and Wormwood, in the latter, in his own peculiar and happy style. We doubt if he has an equal in the Bailie—he fairly seemed to be the generous old Scotchman himself. Wormwood is a detestable character, and his representative contrived to appear as odious in his deformities, as he was amiable in the Bailie. Mr. Duffy's Rob Roy was excellent, and Mrs. Stone's Helen was admirable. Rushleigh was well sustained by Mr. Webb. Diana Vernon, by Mrs. Forbes, was—not so good as it might have been. We really wish we could say something in favour of Mr. Hutchings, but it is quite impossible, if we would preserve our countenance and our credit. He sings tolerably, to be sure; but his acting is cold and spiritless. We wish he would imitate M. Chabert and eat fire for a while.

We have received the first number of a new paper from Utica, entitled The Mechanics' Press. It is neatly printed, in the medium quarto form, and is chiefly occupied by matter interesting and valuable to the meritorious class to whose interests it is devoted. It is published by T. M. Ladd and W. Scram; the terms, to mail subscribers are $2 a year in advance.

Alas, poor Yorick! Sam Patch, the jumper, has, in fact, at last leaped into eternity! He made his last jump on the afternoon of Friday, the 18th inst, from a stage erected on the banks of the Genesee river (just below the falls), one hundred and twenty-five feet above the surface of the stream! His body is not yet found.

The following article relates to a subject which has recently received much attention from the political world, and one which is, or is supposed to be, interesting to every American. With the political notions of the writer we have nothing to do; and in publishing them do not assent, nor object, to their propriety. Mr. B.'s observations on the dimensions, topography, soil, and climate of Texas, will be found new, in some respects, and will add something to every one's information.

From the Daily Cincinnati Gazette.

TEXAS. Mr. Hammond—the article in the Gazette of the 24th inst. extracted from the Village Record, a respectable paper of Pennsylvania, contains one statement that is so excessively erroneous as to require correction. The whole essay is written in an impassioned and partisan style, which betrays a feverish excitement in the mind of the writer, and is, of itself, calculated to bring in question, both his facts and his deductions. Thinking men will pause: but all men do not think; and hence it is that error, and delusion, and falsehood, derive and maintain their pernicious domination. I do not presume any wilful misrepresentation on the part of that writer, for he seems to have borrowed his fearful fact from another quarter, and doubtless he believes it to be true. But the influence of error is not the less mischievous for having its origin in ignorance, or for being disseminated under an honest conviction of its truth. The experience of the world testifies that no opinions are adhered to with more tenacity, or propagated with more zeal, than those which are founded in error.

The statement to which I allude, is contained in the following exclamatory sentence:

"Nine new slave states! Gracious Heavens! Five millions of poor wretches held in bondage!"

These nine new slave states are, as that worthy writer seems to apprehend, to be carved out of the territory of Texas, the acquisition of which he surmises to be the second "point of policy of the new administration." A more egregious error than is couched in this number nine, seldom gains admittance to a newspaper even in high toned party times. I have, as you know, sir, some practical acquaintance with Texas; with its dimensions, topography, soil and climate. I have traversed it from the Sabine to the Rio Grande; and from the Gulf to the mountains; and I am well persuaded that it is not susceptible of any mode of subdivision by which more than four States, of medium size, and fair proportions of natural advantages, could be formed out of it, were it to be incorporated into this Republic. Of these four, two would be maritime, the River Brasos, or the Colorado dividing them North and South; and two would be interior, probably fronting on the old road from the Sabine to St. Antonio de Bexar, and running back to the Mountains. The first two would indeed be rich in agricultural production; and it is an axiom with political economists, that "wealth is power;" ergo: they would be powerful. Each of them would have one, convenient sea port, Galvazion and Matagorda: and these would also be the commercial emporiums for their respective neighbours of the inland. They would certainly possess a soil and a climate that might alarm the cupidity of the British sugar-growers of the western Indies, and excite the envy of the vintagers of southern France for they would forthwith render this nation independent of the one, and in a few years would supplant, in her ample markets, the costly vine of the other. They would enable us to monopolize the Tobacco markets of Europe; to sell, instead of buying, Indigo; and would furnish, in any required quantity, Cotton of a peculiar quality, of a staple and texture, about equal distant between the flues Sea Island, and the best Louisiana, a species of material which our manufacturers would find greatly conducive to the variety, and consequently to the value of their fabrics. They would give us inexhaustible quantities of red cedar and of live-oak, adequate to an almost indefinite multiplication, certainly to the perpetual increase of the Navy, which has shed so much brilliant around this nation's character; and would enable the south to utilize more efficiently with the north in supplying and cherishing that potent arm of the nation's defence. They would in a few years, supply us with all the delicious and costly fruits of the Mediterranean, and would present to the skill and enterprise of our farmers, new varieties of agricultural and horticultural productions, which would not only enlarge the sources of individual enjoyment, but would contribute to the national wealth and aggrandizement. In short, they would make this nation, what all nations desire to be, independent of the world for the necessities, the comforts, and, with very few exceptions, the luxuries of life. Their harbours would be as countervails to the formidable Havana, and would render it no longer a momentous matter to these States, into whose hands the island of Cuba shall fall.

The other two would be farming and grazing, and mineral states. They would possess a soil prolific in all the good things of temperate latitudes; and a climate to which the vale-dwellers of the north might repair with as much hope in the renovation of their health, as they now seek the bright skies, and the genial temperature, and the corrupting society of Italy. They would invite to their bosoms, emigrants from the staunch old grain-producing states, sober, laborious, practical republicans, who have no desire to multiply the evils of slavery, or to participate in the unhallowed dominion of man over his fellows. Such a population, so located, would be a perpetual bond of union between the north and the south, and would partake of the habits and predilections and sympathies of both.

In the rear of these interior states would be a region of mountainous and barren country, which, in the process of some centuries, when the beasts of the forest shall have been exterminated, the nations of red men become extinct, might possibly claim to be organized into one, and perhaps two, territorial governments. But before these would contain a population that could entitle them to admission into the confederacy, this great Republic will in all human probability, be split into as many separate parts, as was the empire of Alexander, or, as may be found in any equal superficies of Europe. If, happily, she holds together until then, her dismemberment will be of little import to human happiness, for, I ween, the great battle of Gog and Magog will have been fought, and this world, with all its garniture, be nigh unto the appointed conflagration.

It is not my intention to descend at large upon the wisdom of this supposed "second point of policy of the new administration;" but, with your permission, I will use the present opportunity to offer some suggestions which may be thought interesting by those whose attention is drawn to this pregnant subject.

There are few countries within the circle of civilization, so imperfectly known as Texas. There is not a single geographer, or writer of travels, or of residences, who has given any thing like a tolerably correct account of it; and therefore it is not strange that erroneous opinions are entertained in relation to its character and extent. I do not design to attempt a geographical description of that beautiful and interesting region, but merely to present some hints that bear peculiarly upon the point of policy in question.

The term Texas, is usually understood to designate the whole tract of country lying between the south-western boundary of the United States, and the river Grande, alias the river Bravo del Norte; these being but different names applied the one to the upper, the other to the lower part of the same stream. Strictly speaking, and according to the political arrangement, Texas does not include the whole of that region. The federal state of Tamaulipas extends to the river Nueces, which empties into the Gulf of Mexico, about 120 miles north of the Rio Grande. The sovereignty of that state spreads over a section of what we call Texas, equal probably to 100 square miles, comprehending the mouth of the Nueces, and the seaboard between it and the Rio Grande. The late Province, now the Department of Coahuila, which, in conjunction with Texas proper, constitutes the state of Coahuila and Texas, also crosses the Rio Grande, and scoops out what is geographically called Texas, a tract of about equal dimensions, with that belonging to Tamaulipas.

The country between Nueces and the Rio Grande, for near 100 miles in breadth from the Gulf, is one continuous prairie, and, excepting a belt of about 30 miles in depth bordering on the Nueces, it is an arid, sandy, and sterile plain, affording scarcely sufficient herbage to sustain the few deer and wild horses that roam upon it, and appear to be allured more by its abundant salt lagoons than by the quantity or the quality of its vegetation.

The Nueces is a long narrow stream, incapable of any useful navigation, and destitute of a harbour for any thing superior to a shallow. The shores of the gulf where it disembogues, are so flat and shallow, and the anchorage in the offing is so remote, that a marauding invader could not debark without encountering immense difficulty, and appalling hazards; and when he should overcome these, he would find himself in an open campaign country, without a single military point, on which he could rest, or to which he could retreat for repose, or reinforcement, in the event of disaster,

But the Nueces is of sufficient magnitude for a well defined national boundary. It rises near the lower spur of that great cordillera which we call the Rocky Mountains, and which already forms the western barrier of this republic. With the exception of a short artificial line to connect the river with the mountains, such a demarcation would constitute a complete natural boundary, in every respect as good and effective for all international purposes, as the Rio Grande itself; one which could not be encroached upon without manifest wantonness and hostility. It would give to the United States almost every acre of good land, and every other natural advantage that belongs to Texas in its largest sense; and it would obviate one capital objection, on the part of the Mexican government to a diminution of its territory. The Mexican is strongly assimilated to the Spanish character; and every body knows that Spaniards are jealous. It was the favourite and uncompromising policy of the old government to keep the North Americans as far removed as possible from their populous settlements on the Rio Grande. The same feeling, prompted by somewhat different motives, will influence the present national councils. They will not be willing to bring the hardy and enterprising, and, as they conceive, ambitious population of the Anglo-American Republic into direct and immediate contact with their ancient towns and villages, and their mining districts, that are sprinkled along the Southern shores of the Great river of the north, which they look to, almost instinctively, as the ultima linea of their native habitations.

On the South bank of the Rio Grande, about forty miles above its mouth, is the city of Matamoros, formerly Refugio. It is the commercial depot for an extensive and populous interior, and imports goods to value of several millions of dollars annually, which are sent on pack mules to Monterey, Saltillo, Chihuahua, Durango, Zacatecas, San Louis, Potosi, and many other minor inland towns. It contains from seven to nine thousand inhabitants, and is increasing with a rapidity that is altogether unexampled in Mexico. The Rio Grande has, in strictness, no harbour. Its mouth is crossed by a bar that does not carry more than five feet of water. The haven of Matamoros is at the Brasos St. Iago, which is an arm of the sea, on the north side of the Rio Grande, projected lateral to it, and separated from it by a low narrow neck of land.

It is not conceivable, then, that Mexico ever will consent to relinquish to a foreign power this only harbor so important, a place as Matamoros, from whence she derives a considerable portion of her revenue of customs. That she would be unwise to do so, is very obvious. The state of Tamaulipas, in which Matamoros lies, would assuredly never yield her assent to so injudicious an alienation of territory. The acquisition of it would be of no value to this Government: for the country on this side of the Rio Grande, and proximate to the Brasos St. Iago, is incapable of supporting even a hamlet of fishermen.

My design, sir, is to state facts, not to argue from them. Motives of delicacy constrain me to leave that matter to others. Your friend, B.

From the Buffalo Republican.

Anecdote. An elderly man from a neighboring town, came into our office, some time since, mistaking the Editor for him of the Buffalo Patriot: he called to give him assurance that he would pay up the balance due on the Patriot in a few weeks. We indulged the worthy anti-mason in his error, by enquiring how the spirit of anti-masonry raged in his town. "It goes," said he, "and I wish, Mr. S. you could see my two boys; one is 19 years old and the other is 16—but true anti-masons as you ever seed." "Do tell if the tender lads are?" was replied to the old man: "Yes: I wish you could see 'Leazer, the youngest; he's what you call a curst, smart boy, and a great genius; 'cause, if you will believe it, he said to 'other day—'Daddy,' says he, 'Daddy,' 'What do you want, sonny?' said I. 'I want to go to Washington, Daddy.' 'What for?' said I. 'Why, Daddy, I've been told that General Jackson is a 'tarnal mason, and I want to shute him!'" "Do you think he'd do it?" we asked in astonishment. A faint smile lighted up the features of the farmer while he exclaimed—"Do it wouldn't he? he would: he's clear grit!"

After expressing our opinion, that such a bright lad should be placed in a public institution, to polish his education, the old man departed highly gratified.

Anti-Masonry in New-York. For the benefit of the anti-masons in the west, who are our especial friends, we beg to mention that Russell Comstock, clerest, nearly beat the whole anti-masouick ticket in this city. Indeed, we had almost forget that such a ticket was run here. [N. Y. Cour. & Enquirer.

POETRY.

SEASON OF PRAYER.

BY HENRY WARE, JR.

To prayer, to prayer:—for the morning breaks,
And earth in her Maker's smile awakes.
His light is on all below and above,
The light of gladness and life and love.
Oh then on the breath of this early air,
Send upwards the incense of grateful prayer.

To prayer;—for the glorious sun is gone,
And the gathering darkness of night comes on.
Like a curtain from God's kind hand it flows,
To shade the couch where his children repose.
Then kneel, while the watching stars are bright,
And give your last thoughts to the guardian of night.

To prayer;—for the day that God has blest
Comes tranquility on with its welcome rest.
It speaks of creation's early bloom,
It speaks of the Prince who burst the tomb.
Then summon the spirits exalted powers,
And devote to heaven the hallowed hours,

There are smiles and tears in the mothers eyes,
For her new-born infant beside her lies.
Oh! hour of bliss! when the heart o'erflows
With rapture a mother only knows.
Let it gush forth in words of fervent prayer,
Let it swell up to heaven for her precious care.

There are smiles and tears in that gathering band,
Where the heart is pledged with the trembling hand.
What trying thoughts in her bosom swell,
As the bride bids parents and home farewell!
Kneel down by the side of the tearful fair,
And strengthen the perilous hour with prayer.

Kneel down by the dying sinner's side,
And pray for his soul through him that died;
Large drops of anguish are thick on his brow,
Oh what is earth and its pleasures now?
And what shall assuage his dark despair,
But the penitent cry of humble prayer?

Kneel down at the couch of departing faith,
And hear the last words the believer saith,
He has hidden adieu to his earthly friends;
There is peace in his eye that upward bends;
There is peace in his calm confiding air;
For his last thoughts are God's, his last words prayer.

The voice of prayer at the sable bier!
A voice to sustain, to soothe and to cheer.
It commends the spirit to God who gave;
It lifts the thoughts from the cold dark grave;
It points to the glory where he shall reign,
Who whispered, "Thy brother shall rise again."

The voice of prayer in the world of bliss!
But gladder, purer, the rose from this.
The ransom'd shout to their glorious King,
Where no sorrow shades the soul as they sing;
But a sinless and joyous song they raise;
And their voice of prayer is eternal praise.

Awake, awake, and gird up thy strength,
To join that holy band at length.
To him, who unceasing love displays,
Whom the powers of nature unceasingly praise,
To him thy heart and thy hours be given;
For a life of prayer is the life of heaven.

From the Keepsake, for 1830.

SONG.

BY SIR WALTER SCOTT.

Joy to the victors! the sons of old Aspen!
Joy to the race of the battle and scar!
Glory's proud garland triumphantly grasping;
Generous in peace and victorious in war.
Honour acquiring,
Valor inspiring,
Burning, resistless, through foemen they go:
War-axes wielding,
Broken ranks yielding,
Till from the battle proud Roderick retiring,
Yields in wild rout the fair palm to his foe.
Joy to each warrior, true follower of Aspen!
Joy to the heroes that gained the bold day!
Health to our wounded in agony gasping;
Peace to our brethren that fell in the fray!
Boldly this morning,
Roderick's power scorning,
Well for their chieftain their blades did they wield;

Joy blessed them dying,
As Maltingen flying,
Low laid his banners, our conquest adorning,
Their death clouded eye-balls descried on the field!
Now to our home, the proud mansion of Aspen,
Bend we, gay victors, triumphant away:
There each fond damsel, her gallant youth clasping,
Shall wipe from his forehead the stains of the fray.
Listening the prancing,
Of horses advancing;
E'en now on the turret our maidens appear.
Love our hearts warming,
Songs the night charming,
Round goes the grape in the goblet gay dancing;
Love, wine, and song our blithe evening shall cheer.

A SCOT'S LUVE SANG.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

Could this ill world hae been contrived
To stand without mischievous woman,
How peaceful bodies wad hae lived,
Released frae a' the ill sae common!
But since it is the wae fu' case
That man mair hae this teasing mony,
Why see a sweet bewitching face?
—O had they no been made so bonny!

I might hae wandered dale and wood,
Brisk as the breeze that whistles o'er me,
As careless as the roe-dur's brood,
As happy as the lands before me;
I might hae screwed my tunefu' pegs,
And carolled mountain streams so gaily,
Had we but wantit a' the Megs
Wi' glossy e'en sae dark an' wily.

I saw the danger, feared the dart,
The smile, the air, an' a' sae taking,
Yet open laid my waresless heart,
An' gat the wound that keeps me waking,
My harp waves on the willow green;
O' wild witch-notes it has nae ony,
Sin' e'er I saw that pawky queen,
Sae sweet, sae wicked, an' sae bonny!

PASSAGES.

"Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and the labour which I had laboured to do.—and behold all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun."—Eccles. ii. 11.

The things of Earth,—oh, heed them not!—the glory which they wear
Will fade, as sunset clouds depart, from the warm Summer air;
The charm they yield are lost in change—their light full soon is done;
They die like Autumn's yellow leaves, when storm clouds dim the sun:
The rainbow-tinted dreams of Joy have an ephemeral bliss—
Touched with our dull mortality, they blend with earthliness;—
And when the night of ill comes on, their day dreams melt away,
And the fettered spirit sighs to leave its prison-house of clay.
Look not on Earth! its flower-like hopes in the glad bosom spring;
One little hour beholds them rent, and pale, and withering;
In Youth, the unclouded eye is lit—the heart is like the air—
As buoyant and mysterious—as pictured and as fair;—
There is no shadow on the soul—and through its stainless skies,
Existence, like an Eden dream, wears an unsullied guise;
Look once again!—and from the lip all winning smiles have passed,
And o'er life's sunny spots have swept, the whirlwind and the blast!
Oh, this is Earth!—A spell it wears, which wakes enthusiast thought,
And in its magic influence, the heart with hope is fraught;
And being seen a scene of Heaven—a picture of the sky,
And like gay birds of Paradise its radiant hours go by;
The sea's glad multitude of waves gance in the unbounded light,
And round its thousand vernal isles, run, melting blue and bright;
And glen, and tree, and fields of green, thrill to the music flung
From Hope's all treacherous lyre of gold, and her persuasive tongue;
And to the heart the world appears in glorious freshness dressed,
As when the dewy robes of Spring lie on the mountain's breast.
Yet over all must sweep the change—the circumstance of Time;—
Who may his wanderings withhold, or check his flight sublime!
His troubled plumes bear along the sunpest-brooding cloud,
Where Grief unfurls her banners wild, and sorrowing hearts are bow'd:
Then let the spirit cherish well, mild life's uncertain hours,
The promise of that "better land" with all its deathless flowers;—
Where the soul in love meets kindred soul—where pain wrings not the breast,
In that glad—"continual city" where the weary are at rest.

THE RIVER.

River! River! little River!
Bright you sparkle on your way.
O'er the yellow pebbles dancing,
Through the flowers and foliage glancing,
Like a child at play.
River! River! swelling River!
On you rush o'er rough and smooth—
Louder, faster, brawling, leaping,
Over rocks by rose-bank sweeping,
Like impetuous youth.
River! River! brimming River!
Broad and deep, and still as Time—
Seeming still—yet still in motion,

Tending onward to the ocean,
Just like mortal prime.

River! River! rapid River!
Swifter now you slip away;
Swift and silent as an arrow,
Through a channel dark and narrow,
Like life's closing day.
River! River! headlong River!
Down you dash into the sea;
Sea, that line hath never sounded,
Sea, that voyage hath never rounded,
Like eternity.

SCHOOL BOOKS published by E. & G. MERRILL, Brooklyn, Mass. and for sale by O. STEELE, Bookseller, No. 437 South Market street.

THE AMERICAN READER, containing extracts suited to excite the love of Science and Literature, to refine the taste, and to improve the moral character. Designed for the use of Schools. Price 75 Cents.

Recommendations. Having examined the "American Reader," recently published by E. & G. Merrill, of Brooklyn, we cordially recommend it, as a School Book to be used by higher classes in common schools. It contains a judicious, choice, and valuable selection of pieces from standard writers. The moral tendency of the selection we consider highly salutary. While it is calculated to assist the pupil in acquiring the art of reading, it will also furnish him with many valuable hints in regard to the formation of character. The merits of this compilation, when known, will, we think, secure for it extensive patronage.

Letter to the Compiler.

Hudley Nov. 25, 1832.

Dear Sir,

I have examined the copy of the American Reader you sent me. The selection of the materials appears to be judicious, and I think it possesses merits superior to any work of the kind which has fallen under my observation.

Prescriber of Hopkins Academy

From the Massachusetts Yeoman. "The American Reader is a handsomely printed duodecimo. It is, the greater part of it, a collection of elegant extracts from some of the best English and American writers, in prose and poetry. Many of the pieces are of very recent publication, giving to the book an interest which is wanting in some other similar works. We think it will be found exceedingly well adapted for the use for which it is designed. It is certainly an interesting miscellany for families, and even for literary readers."

From the Boston Recorder. "The character of the book may be estimated by the writers chosen by the compiler. Among the Europeans are Jane Taylor, Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Ope, H. K. White, Montgomerie, B. Barton and Pollok. Among the Americans are W. Irving, Denham Webster, Griffin, Whelpley, Wayland, Dwight, Humphrey, Wilcox, Beecher, Willis, Mrs. Sigourney and Miss Francis. The whole comprises a very judicious and choice selection."

From a Notice of the Work. "This compilation, in point of general sentiment, is, in our judgement, superior to any recent publication, which we have seen. We recommend the work to the early consideration of School Committees, and hope it may be extensively circulated."

THE FOURTH CLASS BOOK: Containing Lessons in Reading for the young classes in Schools. Price 20 Cents.

This little work contains a selection of Reading Lessons, adapted to the capacities of young scholars, and admirably calculated to interest and instruct them.

It has gone through three editions, within fourteen months from its first publication.

THE CHILD'S ASSISTANT in acquiring Useful and Practical Knowledge. Price 12 1/2 Cents.

The Book comprises brief, comprehensive and interesting Lessons, chiefly in the form of Question and Answer, on the following subjects:—Geography—History—Aborigines of America—American History—The United States—American Revolution—Astronomy—Clouds—Winds, &c.—The Human System—Elementary—Reading—Manners and Customs—Natural History—Industry—Governments—Instances of Ill Manners—Obedience—The Ten Commandments—Intemperance—Improper modes of Pronunciation corrected—Maxims—Etymological Table of Names, important for explaining Texts in the New Testament—Explanation of common French and Latin phrases—Definitions of the most difficult words in this book. It also contains tables of Weight, Measure, Time, Money, &c. &c.

It has been introduced into the primary schools in many of the principal towns in Massachusetts and the neighbouring States.

Recommendations. Extract from a notice of the work, in the Boston Recorder. "This little volume contains information on subjects, chiefly practical and important in the transaction of the ordinary business of life. By an easy introduction of the young mind to an acquaintance with some of the principles of science, it is calculated to give relish for learning, which can never be lost. A copy of this little work ought to be in the hands of every child between four and eight years of age. It deserves to be introduced into all our primary schools, and to be deeply engraven on the memory of every scholar."

From the Massachusetts Yeoman. "We have felt the need, in our own family, of just such an 'Assistant' as this little work. It is designed, by questions and answers, to impart to the inquisitive minds of young children, a knowledge of facts important to be understood by them, and fitted to excite the curiosity to know more. With such a book at hand, every leisure moment may be passed pleasantly to a parent and profitably to the gratified children."

POPULAR EXCITEMENTS,

NO. I.

Diseases of the mind, no less than those of the body, affect the conduct of both individuals and nations, and thus control, in a remote degree, the destinies of man. Intellectual pestilence, though it may spare the principle of life, must feed and fatten upon those ties which originally congregated and still bind our race together, in that social compact inseparable from civilized life. When such pestilence, therefore, prevails, it becomes both the duty and the interest of every good citizen, to check the progress of the infection, and, so far as is practicable, restore the community to peace and happiness.

The state of society, at this period, in the section of the country immediately around us, is such as requires the strictest scrutiny. The feverish condition of the public mind, in relation to the well known subject of Freemasonry, is the result of causes so powerful in their operation, as to require investigation. To such investigation I here devote my exertions; and I trust that, while the weight and solemnity of the subject will counteract the influence of every unworthy or grovelling attempt to divert my attention, I shall not be found unmindful of that duty which, as a citizen, I owe to my fellow men.

The great body of the population, in every society, and in every country, is not chargeable with wilful error, or intentional wrong. It is the misconceptions of the head, and not the perversions of the heart, which have originally moved the population of districts and of empires, to deeds of rapacity and war. The entire history of our race is but congregated testimony in support of this thesis; and the cause of calamities thus produced, must therefore, be sought in that moving principle which first gave perverse direction to the collective desires of the population. This, indeed, will often be found in the degrading propensities of a diminutive member who, aiming at dominion, grovellingly seeks its attainment by insidious appeals to the better feelings of the heart, until the opportune moment arrive when, by rousing the basest of our passions, the wrong thus done us can be secreted beneath the torrent of rage and wild misrule that may be expected to follow. Of this character is that warfare which now distracts society, upon the question I have mentioned. However degrading the confession, none can longer deny that the crime against our laws, in the case of Morgan, is now charged upon the innocent as well as the guilty, for the purpose of political disfranchisement, by a compact of men, if I may be allowed the expression, who are assiduously seeking for personal preferment, under the specious pretext of avenging our instituted laws, and perpetuating our civil institutions. Pretensions of this character have ever been urged by the demagogue who aimed at the subversion of the rights of others. He mechanically adopts that language which virtue has been known to respect, in the hope of concealing his ulterior design, and of claiming, successfully, the good opinion of others for the practice of virtues to which his heart is a stranger. The professions, then, of good and of bad men, are so similar as not to be distinguishable; and hence the imminent danger, in commotions like the present, of leading our aid to wicked men, for purposes we abhor, while we suppose ourselves discharging the most virtuous duties of a citizen. The Roman Emperor Nero, who, to win the populace to his dreadful schemes, could affect to lament that the laws required the punishment of a felon at his hands, did, when occasion served, give force and countenance to the blow of the assassin, when aimed at the life of his own mother. And yet, even this act of parricide he convinced the people was one to which glory and honour should attach, because, in his language, it was perpetrated "for the public good."

It is not my purpose or my province here, to enter upon the merits or demerits of the society of Freemasons. Every virtuous citizen must applaud or condemn them upon the same principle that he would any other body of men; and while I candidly admit that I see among them, as among the rest of mankind, much that I condemn, I must also admit that I see much to approve. Leaving therefore, this abstruse question precisely as I found it, I come at once, to speak of the men who have promoted, and who now sustain that crusade which is fast breaking up and dissolving the very foundations of civil society among us. Their professions being virtuous, we must judge them rather by their acts; and to accomplish this, resort must be had to the history of such popular excitements as have gone before the present, in order to secure whatever advantages may arise from accidental or other similarity of profession and pursuit in the lives of men who have long since passed away. By this light we shall perhaps, be better enabled to read the intentions of such actors, in the existing tragedy, as the plan of my undertaking is designed to embrace. REASON.

NO. II.

The denunciation of "secret societies," has long been the favourite employment of such men as from motives of revenge or aggrandizement, have sought to bring disrepute and suspicion upon those whom their schemes had doomed to such a fate; and as early as the reign of the Roman Emperor Trojan, history informs us that aspirants to state honours and emoluments were so anxious for the public safety, in this particular, that they even persuaded that ruler to refuse the prayers of the city of Nicomedia, for the incorporation of a company of one hundred and fifty firemen, lest so rash a proceeding should endanger the state. The reflecting man of this day will smile at the imaginary fears then expressed, by these guardians of the "public good," and he will also be forcibly reminded, by their reprehensible conduct, of the acts and professions of those who now preside over and direct the popular excitement by which we are at present surrounded.

The condemnatory language applied to the society of freemasons, is far from new or strange; even the sacred religion of our God, and the character of the Saviour of man, were subjected to the same reproaches, in their earliest infancy upon earth. The mild constancy and expanded benevolence of our Saviour, amid surrounding sufferings, were insufficient, in the eyes of his accusers, to atone for his want of judicial robes and regal power; and while his calumniators refused to admit his signal triumph over the powers of the grave, they tauntingly insulted his followers, by invidious references to the ignominious death to which their leader had been subjected. The seekers of authority, distrusting the force of such ungenerous ridicule, soon chose to add to it the more serious charge of impiety, which they accordingly brought against the disciples of Christ. The sublime idea which the early christians entertained of the Supreme Being, escaped the gross conception of the Pagan multitude, and by the ingenious devices of the exclusive guardians of public order, malice and prejudice were brought to concur in representing the whole body of christians as a society of atheists, who, by their daring denial of the religion of the empire, had merited the severest penalties of the laws. So in the present instance: the loose, the vulgar, and the profane, have been called upon by appeals to their grossest appetites, to ridicule, scandalize and condemn those against whom no specific charge can be brought; while the more exemplary portions of society are urged, in the name of piety alone, to wage unceasing war against the same people, for alleged but indefinite profanity, of both thought and deed.

Unfortunately for the character of our race, the machinations of those guardians of "public good," who first put in motion the passions of the multitude in opposition to the principles of Christianity, were rendered so far successful, by the repeated public declarations of the movers that they were actuated only by a desire to preserve the endangered civil institutions of their country, that even rulers themselves were deceived, and "about four score years after the death of Christ, his disciples were punished with death by the sentence of a procurator of the most amiable and philosophic character, and according to the laws of an emperor distinguished by the wisdom and justice of his general administration." The aspirants, finding their schemes so far successful, were encouraged to proceed; and the Christians, through fear of greater evils, were induced to hold their meetings in secret. This innocent transaction was instantly seized upon, and by means of due consideration, at preconcert, it was made to "afford an opportunity for malice to invent, and for suspicious credulity to believe, the horrid tales, which described the Christians as the most wicked of human kind, who practiced, in their dark recesses, every abomination that a depraved fancy could suggest, and who solicited the favour of their unknown God, by the sacrifice of every moral virtue. There were many who pretended to confess or to relate the ceremonies of this abhorred society. It was asserted that a new born infant, entirely covered over with flour, was presented like some mystick symbol of initiation, to the knife of the proselyte, who unknowingly inflicted many a secret and mortal wound, on the innocent victim of his error; that as soon as the cruel deed was perpetrated, the sectaries drank up the blood, greedily tore asunder the quivering members, and pledged themselves to eternal secrecy, by a mutual consciousness of guilt."

Such is the language in which the authentic pages of history are clothed when portraying the horrid consequences of a popular excitement against the Christian religion, engendered seventeen hundred years ago; and which was urged onward by the honest zeal of the populace, who were betrayed into the belief that such a course could alone preserve their national institutions. One can scarcely resist the belief that the movers of the present commotion around us, originally resorted to the annals I have quoted, for the sophistry, the sneers, and the reviling epithets of disgrace, which collectively constitute both the armour and their present warfare. REASON.

ANTI-MASONICK SLANDER.

From the Morristown (N. J.) Anti-Masonick Palladium.

MORE OF THE BEAUTIES OF MASONRY! In our boration of the testimony of Mr. John E. Mulford, and many others in various parts of the country, whose public attention has been awakened, we now have it in our power to present the following case:—

Last week came on to be tried before Justice Freeman, in this town, the case of George Templeton against James Baxter, for trespass. It may be necessary here to observe, that the above defendant is a youth under age, and the cause was supported by his father, George Baxter, a member of the masonick fraternity. The defence was conducted by an attorney of the same kidney. A jury was impanelled, consisting of the following persons, viz: Jeremiah Betts, John W. Cortelyou, John Burnet, Lewis B. Sikes, Elias Jagers, John Crowe, Jacob Fairhouts, James Cory, Moses L. Guerle, Henry A. Haley, Aaron Bonnell, and Uzal Condit.

The following evidence was received, from Ezra and Mary Moore, on the part of the plaintiff, viz: that he, James Baxter, confessed he had broken all the glass in the plaintiff's house, except one window, and that he intended to go and break that also. On the part of the defendant, Henry Moore testified that when he left the house, there were nearly one hundred light of glass and sashes, all whole, but that a short time after he observed they were all broken. Ephraim Young and Joseph Mount, being sworn, also corroborated the fact, that the said glass had been broken, but by whom was unknown to them. The defendant's attorney, on summing up the cause, took occasion expressly to declare that his client (to use his own words, was a griddon man). The cause being regularly committed to the jury, they retired to their room.

Upon such a plain case, no person, among the bystanders, and but one of the jury, expected any difficulty in impaneling the plaintiff without a moment's delay; but upon consultation with one of the jurymen, to the utter surprise of all the rest, was found to object to a verdict; and at once positively declared he never would agree with his fellow-w. In this resolution he steadily persisted to the tenth of each hour, reason and persuasion, from about 7 o'clock in the evening until about 9 o'clock the next day. In the course of this time the defendant, George Baxter, was distinctly noticed by the jurymen, in front of the window, exchanging the Masonick signs and stanzas, with the sec. pub. u. jurymen, until every other person on the panel became fully satisfied of the corruption that was going on, and so openly expressed themselves, until their man of secrets conceived to yield. But on going before the Magistrate and receiving from his masonic brother some further injunctions, he again determined to resist a verdict, and when called upon personally, by the magistrate, firmly gave in his negative, to the perfect astonishment of all present. The jury had then again to retire, and were further detained for two hours longer. By this time the eleven honest men became so completely disgusted with this species of corruption, that they all agreed in justice and faithfulness to the public welfare to make a full publication of the facts of the case, that measures might be adopted to arrest in future, such practices of iniquity, by which the property, nay the liberty and lives of their fellow-citizens became jeopardized. Seeing that a public exposure was likely to result from further obstinacy, the gentleman of secrets finally yielded up his masonick obduracy, and submitted, with the most perfect reluctance, to sanction one of the plaintiff's cases that was ever perhaps committed to the decision of a jury.

Do the public still want further evidence of the truth of the disclosures that we have given, and the positive declaration by more than one hundred and fifty masons of the gospel, together with being two thousand other reputable citizens, who have honestly seceded from the institution of Masonry, that this combination is in fact nothing less than a corrupt-racy against the rights and interests—the lives and liberties of all undisciplined citizens?

Since this barefaced transaction, we are informed that the fraternity are going about denying that the worthy jurymen is a Mason. That some desperate measures would be adopted to rid themselves of this positive evidence against the institution, there could be no doubt; but the declaration of the fraternity, or even the oath of the offender, cannot avail much, after the fact that this jurymen has publicly declared before many witnesses, at the exhibition of Hanks & Allyn, that he was a mason, and that their exhibition varied but little from his knowledge of the mysteries; and still further, that he so understood not only the signs and the nature of their obligations, as intelligibly to exchange them on the one hand with the defendant on this trial and to adhere to the other in violation of his oath before the magistrate.

THE REFUTATION.

From the Morningtown (N. J.) Jerseyman.

We have transferred the foregoing article in our columns in order to afford to our distant readers a specimen of political anti-masonry in Morris county. We did expect that the exposition of the Seward case, with their sixteen Masons in the Legislature, would be the last, but their Assylum for infamy and slander of the 28th October, has put its former numbers to the blush.

It does appear to us that certain men in this Town strive to invent the greatest falsehood to support a sinking cause. Not content with privately circulating slander, hatched at midnight caucuses against their opponents, their press weekly groans with absurd and disgusting emanations from their pens. The law case as above reported in the Palladium, for lack of truth and common decency, is not surpassed by any article in that paper for six months past. With their caption "More of the Beauties of Masonry!" it pretends to give a detailed account of the evidence, and of the conduct of the Jury during the whole course of the trial. The Editor of that paper was not present during any part of the trial, and must have received his information from some of the Jurors—who those Jurors are, and the credibility of their statement, must be judged by an honest and impartial community, for deceit and falsehood will no longer be considered as plain matter of fact.

If the conduct of the "jurymen" as above detailed was true, or even half of it, he would be most deservedly disqualified from ever serving in that capacity again. We have made diligent enquiry for the "Mason" on that Jury, and can find none. Not satisfied with this, we wrote the following Certificate and obtained the signatures of the following eight Jurors. Mr. Vanhouten, whose name is published in italics, and who the writer of the editorial article for the Palladium wishes to be considered as a Mason, it will be perceived has signed it, and no one acquainted with him will dare charge him with certifying to a falsehood. The four who refused to sign the certificate, viz: Lewis B. Stiles, Jas. Coyle, Aaron Bonnel, and Uzal Condict, with some who have, are amongst the most virulent anti-masons in the state. We cannot account for their refusal to sign the certificate in any other way, than that they were unwilling to publicly prove their printer a base pretender of the truth, or their having witnessed the performance of Hanks and Allyn they may be considered as Masons and cannot conscientiously sign it, thereby taking upon their own shoulders an infamous crime they would willingly cast upon an innocent individual.

Presuming that people at a distance are as well satisfied as all in this neighborhood that none of these four are masons, we will give the Certificate of the remaining eight Jurors:

We the undersigned, Jurors in the cause of George Templeton vs. James Baxter, as reported in the Palladium of the 28th October, do hereby solemnly declare that we are not Free-Masons, nor ever have been initiated in the mysteries of it at order in any one of the Degrees. Dated October 26, 1829.

JEREMIAH BETTS,
JOHN W. CORTELYOU,
JOHN BURNET,
ELIAS JAGGERS,
JOHN CROWELL,
JACOB VANHOUTEN,
MOSES L. GUERIN.

I certify that I am not a Free-Mason, or ever have been initiated in any of the mysteries of the society to my knowledge
HENRY A. HALSEY.

What now will be said by the base libeller who furnished the account for the Palladium? Will he still assert there was a Mason on that Jury? One thing he may assert, and with truth, that George Templeton, the plaintiff, and seven of the Jurors were made Masons by Hanks and Allyn, who went about the country manufacturing them for two shillings a head! The plain statement of the case is this. Templeton is a leading Anti-mason, and so were seven of the Jury. Baxter, the father of the defendant, (who is a minor,) is a mason. In pettifoggery his own case Templeton alluded to Baxter's having "been on the grid iron," that he might create a sympathy in the breasts of his anti-masonic brethren. The defendant's counsel resented the allusion, as being manifestly improper and unjust. Out of five of the jurors who were neither masons or anti-masons, four were willing to agree with the seven in a verdict, but one of them being well acquainted with Templeton's character, and disbelieving some of his witnesses, refused, and held out all night. Here then we trust these gentlemen reporters are refuted and nailed to the counter like base coin. But as the affair is to be ended in the county court, it will be proper to suspend any opinion as to the merits of the case until December term, when the whole will be made public, as well as Templeton's threats to some of the witnesses.

Some of our readers may now suppose that the accusation set forth in the Palladium is disarmed of its sting, but they are sadly mistaken. That article is destined to be hurled like a fire brand into distant communities, to inflame the ignorant and distract the wise. It is to be published and re-published with notes and comment, and to be bandied about from print to print, where the refutation can never come. It is to form one link in the grand system of defamation which embraces the whole northern section of our country. In this way the falsehoods published against a late masonic Sheriff, the absurd trash of John R. Mulford, carrying the lie on the face of it, the dastardly attack on an absent Clergyman, the reported conspiracy to set at liberty the prisoners in our jail, and numerous similar charges, have all gone their rounds, (as will also the recent case of Seward,) and served the ends for which they were invented. But "truth is mighty and will prevail." The recent elections in this county and in the state of New-York, loudly proclaim to the world that a vast majority of the people are sensible that anti-masonry as it now exists, is more dangerous than all the secret societies extant. The trial of which we are speaking is a proof of this—else why would several anti-masonic jurors attempt to compel one of their number who was not anti-mason to bring in a verdict for an anti-masonic plaintiff? Why attempt to gain their ends by alternately threatening and coaxing this Juror, who at length was obliged to resist their importunities by personal strength? There probably never was a more disgraceful scene transpired among jurors, than some of these anti-masons were guilty of. We should never have said a word on the subject but for the impolite course pursued by their honest Editor; and since he has so recently and publicly declared that he never published a falsehood, knowing to be such, we hope he will sustain this hard-earned appellation for veracity by contradicting this last falsehood.

HEALTH.

SURE METHOD OF IMPROVING HEALTH &c.

BY A PHYSICIAN.

4. EXERCISE. Trained men should always begin their exercise early in the morning; in summer at six, and in winter at half past seven, or as soon as it is light. The best exercises are walking, riding on horseback, friction with the flesh brush, fencing, quito, tennis, playing at shuttlecock, and the use of the dumb bells. These are used alternately, as convenience serves, but no day must be suffered to pass without one of the first two being used as an out-door exercise, and also one of the remainder as an exercise at home. The time of exercise abroad is never to be less than four hours, and should generally be from five to six, taken at twice or thrice; the period of the in-door exercise being at least one or two hours. If a muscular man, during his training, gets much thinner, his exercise must be reduced; but if he gets fatter, or more muscular, it is a proof that it agrees with him.

Captain Barclay says, "Besides his usual or regular exercise, a person under training ought to employ himself in the intervals in every kind of exertion which tends to activity, such as cricket, bowls, throwing quito, &c. that during the whole day both body and mind may be constantly occupied."

The great object of exercise is to increase and regulate all the secretions and exertions, more particularly the secretions of the stomach, intestines, and liver, and the excretions by the skin and kidneys; to augment the size and power of the muscles; to impart tone to the nerves; and where the habit is corpulent, to take off the superfluities of flesh and fat, to reduce the quantity of blood, and to make it thinner and lighter. By these means a person gains a good appetite, a quick digestion, serenity of mind, and a surprising increase of wind and strength.

Exercise, on the whole, is undoubtedly the most essential branch of training. It is a general rule that perspiration from exercise never weakens.

The union, however, of vigorous exercise and pure air, is the grand secret for the acquisition of strength. Diet itself seems to be but a secondary consideration, provided the quantity of food is small.

5. AIR. The necessity of pure air is uniformly insisted on in every kind of training. The more man is in the open air, the firmer his flesh becomes; and trained persons soon learn almost to disregard the weather, only they must change their cloths if wet. Rising early in the morning is considered indispensable,—in summer, at 5 or 6, and in winter, at seven.

Among the ancients, to be exercised in a pure salubrious air, was deemed of essential importance. The principal schools of the Roman athletes, were accordingly established at Capua and Ravenna, places the air of which was reckoned the most pure and healthy of any in Italy. They carried on their exercises in the open air, in all sorts of weather, the changes of which soon ceased to effect them.

Under training for health, it is indispensable to breathe the open air for four hours a day, at least

6. SLEEP. Persons trained for health and strength ought to go to bed early (at ten o'clock precisely), and are allowed from seven to eight hours sleep. As they take a great deal of exercise, they require rest, and eight hours sleep may be safely allowed, but very rarely more. Under a proper system of training, the sleep is sound, almost unbroken, and therefore exceedingly refreshing.

In addition to the preceding rules, it should be observed, that great cleanliness of the person is necessary, and therefore bathing is recommended. But bathing either in tepid or cold water, has also considerable effect in strengthening the body, and may, consequently, be used twice or thrice a week, when practicable. For very weakly persons, the tepid bath at about 93 degrees brought down gradually to 90 degrees is to be preferred, especially in cold weather; but stronger patients may use the cold bath. The cold or tepid shower bath is very useful. When the bath can not be had, I recommend sponging the whole body with water, (the chill hardly taken off,) every morning, on getting up, following it quickly with a good deal of rubbing with a hard towel.

Keeping the feet perfectly dry at all times is highly necessary.

EFFECTS OF TRAINING ON THE BODY. All my readers will readily perceive that the training now described must invariably have great and important effects on every part of the body, and especially on the head, the stomach, the lungs, the skin, the bones, and the nerves.

In regard to the head, a man in the best ordinary health, when he strikes or receives a few blows, becomes giddy; but this defect is corrected in the course of training, and giddiness is prevented. Severe blows on the head are also soon recovered.

Its beneficial effects on the stomach and lungs are remarkable. The appetite sharpened, and the digestive powers so improved, that all sense of uneasiness and oppression at the stomach are removed by it, and the food taken is digested easily and perfectly. Jackson the trainer, states that a course of training is an effectual remedy for bilious complaints.

By improving the condition of the lungs, training insures a free and powerful respiration; which is a sign of good health, and is essential to a fresh colour of the face, to lively spirits, to cheerful feelings, and to the healthy and vigorous action of the body. The chest is made much more open by it. Boxers, when trained, surprisingly improve their wind, as it is said; that is, they are enabled to draw a deeper inspiration, to hold their breath longer, and to recover it sooner, after it is in a manner lost.

It has likewise a great influence on the skin: which it renders clear, smooth well coloured and elastic, although formerly subject to eruptions. Even the skin of a fat person, when he grows leaner under training, does not hang loose about him, but becomes elastic and tight.

On the bones and nerves training has considerable effect. The former become much harder and tougher; indeed, it is well known that the bones of race horses, for example, are as hard as ivory, and that the bones of boxers are very seldom broken, even under the violent blows they receive. The nerves are most effectually strengthened by it; so much so that it is asserted that no trained person was ever known to become paralytic, or to continue under nervous depression.

The shape, likewise, is greatly improved; the belly, in particular, is reduced, which is absolutely necessary for a freer respiration; the chest is expanded, and different muscles and parts which are unduly enlarged, are reduced, while those which are preternaturally small gain an increase of bulk. We have a proof of this in the fact, that persons who are regularly and constantly exercised, as fencing masters, &c. retain their appearance, carriage, and shape to the last, which is much in favour both of their health and longevity.

Such is the nature, and such is the effect of training. By the process described, as an able writer correctly remarks, the nature of the human frame is totally altered; and in the space of a few months, the form the character, and the powers of body, are completely changed, from gross to lean, from weakness to vigorous health, and from a breathless and bloated carcass, to one active and untiring; and thus, the very same individual who but a few months before became giddy and breathless on the least exertion, has his health not only improved, but frequently is enabled to run many miles with the fleetness of a greyhound, or in a shortness of time hardly to be credited, to walk above a hundred.*

But these effects are not only remarkable, they are also permanent. In training for wrestling or fighting, indeed, men are brought to the very top of their condition, as it is termed, in a very short period, by carrying the process to an extreme, and it is found they can not be kept in that condition for any length of time; but in training for health, our objects are different, and, therefore, the mode of proceeding is in some measure different; we proceed in as certain, though a less forcible manner, in order that the effects should be both great and lasting.

In conclusion, I would express my hope that the hints here given respecting the uses of training may be found of advantage, not only by my unprofessional, but likewise my professional readers. Medical men pay far too little attention to it in the treatment of chronic diseases.

* "This training art has arrived to such great perfection in this country, as to throw new lights on the physical changes which the body is capable of receiving from preventive measures, even in advanced years. Its vigour is thereby augmented, the respiration improved, by lessening the size of the belly, and the skin cleared from its impurities, and so much improved in elasticity, colour, and tone, in the space of two or three months, as to denote the perfection of the art."

HISTORICAL.

From the Foreign Quarterly Review.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

The original policy of Spain as to her colonies was unquestionably mild, but the practice was widely different. This observation applies equally to all of them. New Spain was governed by a viceroy, endowed with all the prerogatives of royalty, having the only immediate check in the Audiencia, which had the right of direct communication with the sovereign at home, and with the powerful council of the Indies. So great, we have understood, was the veneration with which the Indians regarded the representative of majesty, that at no very remote period they were in the habit of prostrating themselves whenever he appeared in public. The "divinity with which he was hedged" was in a great degree kept up by the policy of the Spanish court, which, among other means, prohibited him, as well as the members of the Audiencia, from marrying a Creole, engaging in traffic, or holding property in the country over which they presided. In the event of the death of the viceroy, the government was held by the chief oidor.

Although the Recopilacion de los Leyes de las Indias was originally simple enough, yet the multitude of decrees that have been progressively added to it rendered it a rare mass of contradiction and confusion, and consequently an admirable instrument for the corrupt administration of justice. Especially privileges too, of endless multitude, which were chiefly enjoyed by Europeans, furnished abundant grounds of complaint. The chief, if not the sole protection of the great mass of the people, was afforded by the local municipalities, which maintained a larger share of independence than their prototypes in the mother country.

In the ecclesiastical establishments the Pope was nothing compared with the King of Spain, every thing being done by the authority of the latter, as the head of the American church, formally recognized by a bull of Alexander VI. To the King, therefore, all looked, as the only source from which honour and wealth could flow. And the distinctions of caste, as well as these of European and Creole, were sedulously kept up. From the situation of viceroy, down to that of the lowest custom-house officer, Creoles were practically excluded; and it was only very shortly before the revolution that the door to preferment was opened to them. In fact the European Spaniards formed a privileged caste, who enjoyed every advantage that could be commanded, among which the profits of corruption did not rank in the least prominent situation. The viceroys, with some few honourable exceptions, set the example of enriching themselves, without the least regard to the means employed; while the select few who could thus profit, by forming a separate and commanding interest, set inquiry or correction at defiance.

The operations of the Inquisition, too, had their full share in upholding the system of exclusion, ignorance, and oppression. While these political distinctions excited violent heart-burnings, the commercial monopoly exercised by the old Spaniards, and the imperious orders to restrict the industry of the colony to such productions as could not interfere with those of the parent state, produced a restless irritation, which could only have been kept down by the most soothing and conciliatory measures. Such was the state of affairs when the invasion of Spain by Napoleon took place, in 1808. A succession of events had lessened the almost superstitious veneration with which the Americans had regarded their sovereign, who was in fact the only link that connected them with Europe. The assumption of authority by bodies of which they knew nothing (the Cortes), and the ill-judged and inconsistent proceedings of these bodies,—at one moment extending the rights of Spanish citizens to all their transatlantic brethren, at another revoking those acts of wisdom and justice,—all tended to loosen the bonds of a connexion which had previously been mainly upheld by the force of opinion. Mr. Ward has traced with much ability the progress of these feelings. In speaking of the formation of juntas in the different governments in America, professing attachment to the parent state, he well observes, that "it is difficult to ascertain how far these professions of attachment, on the part of the new governments, were sincere. Many of their members undoubtedly aspired to independence from the first; but the majority would have been satisfied with moderate reforms; and it was, perhaps, the necessity of conciliating these, as well as the great mass of the people, (who certainly were not prepared to throw off their allegiance at once,) that forced the bolder spirits to temporize, and to disguise their real designs under the mask of devoted loyalty."

The same causes appear to have had almost simultaneous effects throughout the whole of the Spanish colonies, although so widely apart, and each in a state of entire ignorance as to what was going on in the others. The truth is, that the oppression was the same in all, and the effects were only modified by the diversity of temperament on which it acted. Each therefore, individually, pursued its object, unconnected with the rest; and each was obliged to cope singly with whatever force Spain could bring to bear against it. Mexico appears to have retained her attachment to the last;—but she, too, laboured under the excitement of the period, and although in some instances peculiarly favoured, had enough to complain of, at the time of which we have been speaking. Such was the feverish state of Mexico in 1808, when Iturrigaray succeeded to the viceroyalty. The distracted situation of Spain produced a burst of loyalty from the native Mexicans; and as their interests were supposed to be protected by the Viceroy, the Audiencia, regardless of the signs of the times, determined to arrest and depose him; a resolution which was carried into effect by a number of European Spaniards. Various reasons were assigned for this rash measure; but the Creoles considered it rightly as an indication of their continued vassalage. This conviction, confirmed by the intemperate conduct of the Spaniards, excited some slight commotions, which, though repressed, were only the prelude to a most formidable explosion.

Don Miguel Hidalgo Costilla, Parish Priest of Dolores, was the first who lighted the train. He had been considerably irritated by the check given by the government to some improvements he had introduced in his neighbourhood, and he viewed the measures of the Spanish party as part of an infamous system of Creole debasement. He is described as a man of considerable reading, strong understanding, and great firmness of character. He does not, however, appear to have been very circumspect in his proceedings, for his schemes became known to the government in the city of Mexico, and orders were received by the Intendant, on the 13th September, 1810, to arrest him, with Allende, Aldama, and Abasolo—three Creole officers then at Guanajuato—in consequence of its having transpired that it was their intention to surprise the whole of the Europeans on the 1st of October, and that they had seduced some non-commission officers to join them. Being apprized of the intention of the Intendant, on the 18th September Hidalgo and his confederates, with ten followers, arrested seven Europeans resident in Dolores. This trifling success led such numbers to his standard, that, in an incredibly short space of time, he took possession of San Felipe and San Miguel el Grande; and with the plunder of the Europeans he satisfied the wants of his tumultuary followers. He next summoned Riano, the Intendant in Guanajuato; but that magistrate shut himself up in the public granary, and defended it with great vigour until he was killed, when the gate was forced and a most merciless carnage made. Mr. Ward mentions that he knows an individual (whom we also knew), of whose family no less than seventeen perished on that fatal day. It is impossible to convey a more adequate idea of the ruthless destruction effected by the Indians, than by stating the fact, that although the capture was not completed until five o'clock on Friday evening, not one house belonging to any European was left standing on Saturday morning.

Hidalgo is supposed to have encouraged these atrocities, to render the contest one that could never terminate amicably. The Viceroy, D. Francisco Xavier Venegas, had been at first disposed to treat this insurrection of the natives with contempt; but he was soon disabused, and forces were collected from all points to put down what he considered an audacious rebellion. While these important proceedings were going on, the aid of the spiritual arms was also called in, and Hidalgo was excommunicated, both by his Diocesan and the Metropolitan. Regardless of these fulminations he proceeded, with a large accession of force, to Valladolid, where he received fresh reinforcements, and the invaluable co-operation of Don Jose Maria Morelos, the Priest of Necupetaro, whose talents place him in the first rank of Mexican patriots.

There are some characters who appear to superficial observers to be full of contradiction, change, and inconsistency, and yet they that are in the secret of what such persons are driving at, know that they are the very reverse of what they appear to be, and that they have one single object in view, to which they as pertinaciously adhere, through every circumstance of change, as the bound to the hare, through all her mazes and doublings. We know that a windmill is eternally to work to accomplish one end, although it shifts with every variation of the weathercock, and assumes ten different positions in a day.

It was observed of a philosopher who was drowned in the Red sea, "that his taste would be suited, for he was a man of deep thinking, and always liked to go to the bottom."

THE BETROTHED*.

"I never heard
Of any true affection, but was surprised
With care, that, like the caterpillar, eats
The leaves of the spring's sweetest book—the rose."
Middleton.

"Lucy! Lucy dear! do come down, if it is only for a minute! I have something very particular to say to you," but Lucy made no reply. "Lucy Morgan, Lucy dear—It is I—Cynric Owen." He threw a pebble at the window; and, presently, it was gently opened, and the figure of a young girl appeared, gazing cautiously around. "My dear Lucy, can't you come down to me?" exclaimed Cynric, as his dark eye sparkled in the moonlight with joy at the sight of his cousin.

"Gracious Heaven—Cynric! Is it you? In the name of all that is rash, what has brought you here?"

"What should bring me here but my true love for you, Lucy? But come down, and I will tell you all."

Lucy hesitated a moment before she consented; but she did consent; for, although she well knew that her cousin Cynric was one of the wildest lads on the hill side, she knew also that he loved her with all the warmth and sincerity of his impetuous spirit; and, notwithstanding all his errors, her heart told her too truly that she loved him as fervently. So, throwing a cloak over her dress, she joined her impatient lover.

It was a beautiful night; and of that sweet season when twilight has scarcely merged into darkness before day begins to dawn. It was not yet ten o'clock, for Pryce Morgan, Lucy's father, was an utter enemy to any innovation upon the usages of his ancestors; and as the sun rose scarcely earlier than he did, so did the God of day descend not into the sea long before our Welsh squire retired to his dormitory. This Cynric was well aware of, and he knew that his uncle was now soundly wrapped in sleep.

Lucy was the first to speak—"For heaven's sake, Cynric, why do you run this risk, when you know that there is a warrant out against you for that affair at Duffryn? Indeed, indeed you are too venturesome."

"Never mind, Lucy; so that I see you, and press this kiss upon those sweet lips, I care not much about the risk. And how have you been, dear, and how is my worthy kinsman your father?"

"We have been but sadly, Cynric—all of us. My father grieves deeply about you, and seldom goes out now."

"Grieves about me, Lucy! Oh, no! he who has injured me so deeply, cannot care much about the welfare of his victim."

"You do him wrong, Cynric, indeed you do. My father always loved you as a son, would that I had only loved you as a brother! It was your own impetuous, ungovernable spirit that brought this evil on you and on us. Oh, Cynric! I wish we had never known each other!" and Lucy's tears fell fast, as she hung weeping on her cousin's shoulder.

Cynric bit his lip, as he endeavoured to restrain one of those ungovernable gusts of passion, which so often possessed him. "This is no time for reproach or explanation, Lucy," he muttered; "I came here," and now his voice was loud and hurried, "to tell you that I love you better than ever; and by Heaven I swear!"

"Swear nothing now, Cynric!" interrupted Lucy, exceedingly alarmed at the vehemence of her lover. Remember that I am here alone with you against my father's express commands; and at an hour when I ought to be in my chamber. If you do, indeed, love me, be calm, I beseech you, Cynric."

"I will! dearest, I will; I am a fool, Lucy, a mad-brained, thoughtless fool! But you must promise me one thing, that you will give me a meeting to-morrow evening at dusk at Lowry Pugh's cottage."

* The facts, upon which the following Tale is founded, occurred in a family of considerable note in North Wales.

"I do promise," was Lucy's faint answer.

"And that you will come alone?"

"I will."

"Then, for the present, farewell! and may God shield you from all sorrow!"

"May he shield you, Cynric, from all harm; farewell!" and so saying, the lovers kissed each other, and Lucy entered the house, while Cynric stood gazing eagerly and anxiously at her chamber window, till he saw by her shadow passing between it, and the light of her candle, that she had safely reached her apartment. He murmured a short prayer for her happiness, and then bent his steps towards a lofty ridge of hills, that skirted the horizon from east to west, lying on the face of the green earth, like a huge land-leviathan.

The situation of Cynric Owen was unfortunate in every respect; and the shadow of a dark and evil destiny had shrouded him even from his cradle. Born of a widowed mother, who had offended her kindred by marrying a profligate young man, he came into the world, unwelcomed by those glad festivities, which commonly ushered in the birth of his kindred. On the contrary, he was received by his broken-hearted and disordered mother with tears and with bewailings: for what comfort had she in the birth of such a babe? and five years afterwards, when the hand of death was upon her, the bitterness of the last hour was poignantly sharpened by the conviction that her infant son was to be thrown upon the cold charity of unkind kindred. But there was one amongst her numerous stock of uncles, aunts, and cousins, who was possessed of that infirmity—a kind and compassionate heart; and, while he soothed the agony of her dying hour, he still farther comforted the poor widow by promising to protect her child. This was her cousin Pryce Morgan, who took home the boy, a mischievous urchin of five years old.

Pryce Morgan was himself a widower, with one child, and that a daughter. He had loved his wife so dearly, that her death, while yet in the full fragrance of youth and loveliness, rendered him morose, irritable, and unhappy. Thus constituted, he was of all persons, the most unfit to rear so wayward and unbending a spirit as Cynric Owen's. It required infinitely more skill and patience than the squire possessed, to bring into proper subjection and control the fierce will of his kinsman; and, from the very moment of his domestication at Garthmeilan, his impulses were left to take their own course, not uncontrolled entirely it is true, but controlled in such a manner as to render their possessor only more vehement, wild, and impatient of correction.

As Cynric approached towards manhood his disposition assumed a more determined character, and his manners a more decided tone. Impetuous as the mountain torrent, and swift in resolution as its flashing waters, his purposes were executed without a single reflection as to their expediency or consequences. "Uncle!" he would say to his guardian, "I am going to Chester fair to-morrow. I know that the snow is deep in the valleys, and that the road is pathless and perilous; but I have promised Lucy a fairing, my word is pledged to it, and I must go." And before he was sixteen years old has he ventured forth from the middle of Merioneth shire on horseback to Chester, in the depth of winter, and in such weather, as the boldest shepherd dared not encounter. It was useless, and worse than useless, to remonstrate with him, and so his kinsman never attempted it, and he was permitted to do as he pleased, unchided, and often unquestioned.

One being, one gentle being, there was at Garthmeilan, who could assuage the fierce passion of Cynric Owen, sometimes even in its hottest moments. Need I add that Lucy Morgan was that gentle being? With a beauty more winning than commanding, more confiding than imposing, and with a disposition so sweet and gentle, yet resolute enough upon occasion, Lucy presented a direct contrast to her cousin. Yet was she, of all persons, the best calculated to manage him; and often, when his soul was fearfully shaken by the ungovernable mastery of his stormy feelings, has she soothed him even to tears: but even she could not always succeed in allaying the fury of his passion, which burst forth like a mountain-flood crushing, and overwhelming, and scattering abroad every obstacle opposed to its vehemence.

These natural evils were in some degree neutralized by acquirements of a character well suited to his rank, but capable of misuse and misdirection. Those manly accomplishments which become the mountaineer, and which constitute so considerable a portion of his pastime, were by Cynric Owen exercised only among persons of low condition at the fairs and wakes about the country. With such associates, it is true, he reigned paramount; and while their adulation flattered his vanity, their servile submission accorded well with that love of mastery, which so materially governed his conduct.

It was at one of these meetings at a fair in Duffryn, a secluded mountain district beyond Barmouth, that the "unfortunate affair," alluded to by Lucy, took place. During a wrestling match between Cynric's party, and some mountaineers from Caernarvonshire, a dispute arose as to the fairness of one of the throws. Words grew high, as they always do when Welshmen quarrel, and each party became more strenuous in maintaining its point. From words the transition was easy enough to blows, and before the fray ended, one of the Caernarvonshire men was knocked on the head and killed. It was said that the blow was given by Cynric; at all events, he, as the leader, and most important person of the party, was fixed upon as the offender, and a warrant had been issued for his apprehension. Since this event he had not been at Garthmeilan since the night we have mentioned; and Mr. Morgan and Lucy were much alarmed at his absence, as they had been fully apprized of the transaction. They concluded, however, that he was concealed somewhere up in the mountains; but they had in vain endeavoured to discover his retreat, as none of his usual associates knew any thing about it.

Faithful to her promise, and full of agitation, Lucy, at the appointed hour, sought Lowry Pugh's cottage. Lowry was one of those aged pensioners, who are to be found attached to the demesne of every Welsh squire: her best days had been spent in the service of the family; and her old age was now petted and protected by its members, in return for the fidelity of her attachment. The old woman, now more than "threescore years and ten," was very comfortable, and all that she wanted, she said, was to see her dear Miss Lucy happily married. Lately Lucy had spent a good deal of her time at old Lowry's cottage; for she had made the old woman a confidant respecting that which, by the way, every one about the house sufficiently knew, namely, her love for Cynric; and she delighted to talk of him, especially now that his fate was so uncertain and overshadowed. It was, therefore, no cause of alarm to Lowry to see Lucy enter her humble dwelling after sunset; although her agitation on the present occasion did not long escape her notice. "Dear child," said the old woman, "you are not well: tell me, what is the matter?"

"I have seen him, Dowry," murmured poor Lucy; "and he will here to night."

"Here!" echoed the old woman, "here! Then he is safe! But when did you see him?"

Lucy told the old woman the adventure of the night before; and she had scarcely concluded, before the door of the cottage was darkened by a shadow, and the next moment Cynric sprang into the apartment.

"It is very kind of you, dear, to keep your promise with me," said he, as he pressed her to his heart. "It is not every one that would have been so mindful of me in my trouble."

"It is not every one that loves you as I do, Cynric. But tell me, for heaven's sake tell me, where have you been since you left us?"

"Hiding among the hills, love, and often, Lucy, nearer you than you supposed."

"But how have you subsisted?"

"I am not without friends, and they feed me."

"I fear, Cynric, that those friends, as you call them, would lead you into deeper guilt. These arms," glancing with a shudder at the pistols in Cynric's belt, "are for purposes of further outrage; and with your hot blood and daring spirit are doubly dangerous."

"Guilt!" said you, Lucy—"guilt!" I am not guilty. Foolish I have been, hot and headstrong I have been; but, by heavens, I am not guilty!"

"Speak those words again, Cynric—say them again!" hurriedly exclaimed Lucy, as her eyes beamed with transitory delight. "Oh! how I have sorrowed and suffered, Cynric, when I thought that your hand was stained with the blood of a murdered man; and that the doom of a murderer was hanging over you. Why—oh! why did you not tell us this before?"

"I did not think that you, Lucy, would believe every idle tale that the wind might blow to your ears; and I did think that you knew me better than to suppose me guilty of such a crime. I was, it is true, engaged in the fray; but the fool fell not by my hand."

"Then why not return to us? My father has some influence with the magistrates; and you, at least, might be cleared of the crime. Come back to us, dear Cynric—return with me to-night, even now!"

"To-night, Lucy! did you say to-night, and now?" He rose from his seat, and paced the floor in a fit of gloomy abstraction. Suddenly he started, as if from a dream, and exclaimed, while his eye flashed fire,—"No, Lucy, no! I will not return. To exculpate myself I must criminate others. I must turn informer and betray my friends, those friends who have succoured and shielded me. Chance has fixed this crime upon me; and I will not by accusing others clear myself—I will die rather!"

"You say you love me, Cynric," said Lucy, mildly; "and you have often said you prize my love. For my sake then—for her sake, who has loved you through all the changes of your wayward spirit, and who loves you still—God knows how fondly! cast off this foul blot upon your character, clear yourself of this dreadful charge, and we shall all be happy again."

"You know not what you ask, Lucy—I cannot, I dare not clear myself."

"You dare not, Cynric! You, who have dared so much! Alas! you must be leagued with fearful men, if such a feeling holds you from the truth."

"Urge me no more, Lucy—as you value my existence, urge me no more!" He paced the cottage hurriedly, with flashing eyes and folded arms. Then suddenly gazing out upon the hills, he continued:—"The evening star has risen, and shines over the Cribyn. I must leave you, and that instantly."

"Leave me, Cynric—and so soon! Cruel, cruel Cynric!" and poor Lucy sank sobbing upon old Lowry's neck.

Cynric was fearfully—terribly agitated; and his dark eye, restless even in his calmer mood, was now darting fire, as his proud heart was torn by the conflicting emotions, which filled his breast. There was his love for Lucy on the one hand, and on the other, his duty to those who had shielded him from peril.

"It cannot be, Lucy—it must not be," he muttered. "Another time, perhaps, I may,—I will grant your request;—but to-night—it is impossible."

"I did not expect this from you, Cynric," said Lucy, as rising from her weeping posture, she assumed an air of offended dignity. "Had I urged you to the commission of some deed of darkness, I might have better borne your refusal; but to deny me this argues little for your love."

Lucy had touched the most sensitive string of Cynric's proud unbending heart. To be suspected of not loving her with all the enduring fervour and undiminished constancy, of which his ardent nature was capable—and by herself, too—was a stab—that made him writhe with agony.

"Love you, Lucy!"—he burst out. "You know I love you—deeply—fondly—daringly love you! And I swear that no peril or pain, no joy or woe, shall ever change that love! And, now, reproachful girl!—swear you the same to me. Swear—that whatever may be my fate you will be mine, mine only, and mine for ever!"

Lucy trembled before her agitated lover, and fearful of adding to his agitation, she murmured, as she sunk once more upon old Lowry's bosom. "I do swear, Cynric; and may God grant a happy issue to our 'BETHROTHING!'"

Cynric raised her from her drooping posture and, clasping her in his arms, kissed her again and again, as he called his own Lucy, his beloved, his betrothed Lucy. The frenzy of his impetuous spirit was instantly assuaged by the readiness of Lucy's assent; and he was now as calm as when he first entered the cottage. "We part now," he said, as he led her towards the door—"soon to meet again. Give me this token of our betrothing, Lucy, and I will give you this." He drew an antique gold ring from Lucy's finger, which he put into his bosom; and gave her in return an old gold coin; which had hung round his neck since infancy. And—impressing another kiss upon her lips, he rushed out of the cottage, leaving Lucy to watch his lessening form, as he ascended the hill side in the gathering darkness.

CHARACTER.

THE ESSENES.

The following beautiful description of the ancient religious sect, the Essenes, is extracted from a History of the Jews, which forms the sixth number of The Family Library, now in the press at Murray, London.

At a considerable distance from the metropolis, in some highly-cultivated oases, amid the wilderness on the shores of the Dead Sea, were situated the chief of the large agricultural villages of the Essenes. According to Philo, their number was about 4000. Almost in every respect, both in their rules and in the patient industry with which they introduced the richest cultivation into the barren waste, the Essenes were the monastick orders of the Jews. Among groves of palm-trees, of which, according to the picturesque expression of Pliny, they were the companions, and amid fertile fields won from the barren wilderness, they passed their rigid and ascetick lives. They avoided populous cities, not from hatred of mankind, but from dread of their vices. In general, no woman was admitted within their domains. Some of the inferior communities allowed marriage, but only associated with their wives for the procreation of children; the higher and more esteemed societies practised the most rigid celibacy, and entirely foreswore all communion with the other sex. Wonderful nation, says the Roman naturalists, which endures for centuries, but in which no child is ever born. They were recruited by voluntary proselytes, or by children whom they adopted when very young, and educated in their discipline. Among the Essenes all pleasure was forbidden as sin; the entire extinction of the passions of the body was the only real virtue. An absolute community of goods was established in their settlements: even a man's house was not his own; another person might enter and remain in it as long as he pleased. The desire of riches was proscribed; every lucrative employment, commerce, traffick, and navigation, were forbidden. They neither bought nor sold; all they had was thrown into a common fund, from which each received the necessities of life; but for charity, or for the assistance of the poor or the stranger, they might draw as largely as they would on this general revenue. They were all clothed alike in white garments, which they did not change till they were worn out; they abhorred the use of oil; if any one were anointed against his will, he scrupulously cleansed himself. Their lives were regulated by the strictest forms; they rose before the sun, but were forbidden to speak of any worldly business, and devoted all the time till break of day to offering up certain ancient prayers that the sun might shine upon them. After this they received their orders from the superior, and went to work, according to his commands, at the labour or craft in which they were skilled; but their artisans might only work on articles used in peace, by no means on swords, arrows, or military weapons,—though they carried arms when they travelled, to defend themselves against robbers. Having worked till the fifth hour, eleven o'clock, they assembled for refreshment. First, however, they washed, and put on a linen garment; they then went into a room which no one might enter who was not of their sect. After that, they entered the common refectory as if it were a sacred place; there in silence waited till grace was said; then each received his portion, from the baker and the cook, of bread, salt, and hyssop; another grace closed the meal: then, putting off the sacred garment, they returned to their toil till evening, when they assembled to supper. No noise or tumult was heard; they spoke only by permission and in turn: on other occasions, if ten were met, one could not speak without the consent of the nine. In company, they were to avoid spitting either before them or to the right hand. They observed the sabbath with the strictest precision, not even the lighting a fire or performing the necessities of nature. At all other times they concealed their excrements with scrupulous care, digging a pit of a foot deep, lest the holy light should be defiled. They then washed themselves with great care. On the sabbath they all met in their synagogues, where the elders interpreted the sacred writings, explaining them chiefly by parables. In their religious opinions they differed from their countrymen; though they sent their gifts to the Temple, they offered no sacrifices there. They were strict predestinarians. They believed the body was mortal, the soul immortal: that the soul, emanating out of the noblest and purest air, is imprisoned in the body, where it is subjected to several trials; when released from its corporeal bonds, it escapes as it were a long servitude, and soars back rejoicing to its native element. They believed, with the Greeks, in a delightful region beyond the ocean, in which souls of the good dwell for ever. There rain, and snow, and parching heat, were unknown, but the air was continually refreshed with balmy and gentle breezes from the sea. The souls of the wicked were doomed to a cold and gloomy place of everlasting punishment. They were great students of their sacred books, and especially of the prophetick writings. Many were endowed, according to Josephus, with that gift. They studied likewise the nature and cure of diseases, and the medicinal properties of herbs and minerals. Their morals were rigid in every respect. They were bound, by solemn vows, to worship God, and to be just to men; to keep inviolable faith; if intrusted with authority, to abstain from all wrong, and from splendid apparel: to love truth, and hate liars; to communicate only to the members of the society the tenets of the sect; to preserve their sacred doctrinal books, and the names of the angels. They paid the highest veneration to age; many of them, from their temperate habits, lived to more than one hundred years. They abstained from all oaths considering an oath as bad as perjury. They abhorred slavery, as an infringement of the natural liberty of men. In their civil constitution, they were all equal as regards their rights, but divided into four classes; of which the superior class looked down so much on those beneath them, that if touched by one of a low order, they were defiled, and washed themselves. There were stewards who managed the common stock, and officers who took care of all strangers who might enter their towns. No one was admitted into the society without the strictest probation; the proselyte received a small pickaxe, linen garments, and a white dress, and so commenced his year of novitiate. After having given satisfactory proof of continence and temperance for that period, he was admitted to closer intimacy, and to wash in the holy water; yet for two years longer he remained on trial, and only at the end of that time was admitted to the common refectory. Whoever was guilty of any great crime was expelled from the society—a fearful doom! for having sworn that he would receive no food but from his own sect, the outcast fed, like a beast, on the grass of the field, till at length he perished with hunger. Sometimes, if at the last extremity the criminal shewed sincere repentance, he was readmitted, from compassion, within the society. But this awful fate was inflicted with great reluctance; for justice was administered with the utmost care; and no verdict could be given unless a hundred were present; it was then irrevocable. The Essenes were cruelly persecuted by the Romans, who probably entered their country after the capture of Jericho. They were tortured, racked, had their bones broken on the wheel, in order to compel them to blaspheme their lawgiver, or eat forbidden meats. They did not attempt to appease their tormentors; they uttered no cry, they shed no tear; and even smiled in the worst agony of torment; and in steadfast reliance on the immortality of their souls, departed, rejoicing, from life.

LAST HOURS OF GOV. LINCOLN.

The last number of the Yankee and Boston Literary Gazette contains an article on the late Governor Lincoln of Maine, some interesting extracts from which are given below.

"He was not afraid of death—after he knew that death was inevitable; nor was he afraid of it before, properly speaking, though he would have resisted the approach, and avoided the presence of unworthy danger, like every other rational man, if he had been able to do so. He conversed on the subject hour by hour, and with perfect composure—nay, with a sort of strange, mournful pleasantry: for it so happened that one day, as he and the adjutant-general of the state, an old and very intimate friend, were sitting together, he remarked that he should have to stay with him; to which the general, who had no idea of his danger, and who saw nothing in the observation but a desire to converse on a favorite though dangerous theme, replied—Well, well, governor, we can give you a good tomb here. The next day or the day after, finding that he could keep no food upon his stomach, not even a light broth, the governor turned to the general's wife, as she sat near, and said with a smile, which never quite abandon his mouth, Well madam, I believe I shall have to accept your husband's invitation.

But one of the most remarkable circumstances that attended his death was this. During the whole of his delirium, he never uttered an equivocal sentiment, nor an improper word. Nay more, he never lost sight of his own personal dignity—nor of what he owed as a man to the presence of a female: for in his nercest paroxysms, he would suddenly recollect himself so far as to wrestle down, with overmastering power, the spirit that shook him, and apologize in the language of a gentleman for the unhappy 'hallucination,' as he termed it, which he had been partially subdued by.

On one occasion he insisted on getting up. The general remonstrated with him, and urged him to lie down. But he refused—he would not be controlled. You may have physical superiority, said he, but you shall not control my mind. The general saw it was vain to argue with him in the usual way. Governor, said he, you are a philosopher, and will not contend with what is inevitable. The poor delirious man looked at him—smiled faintly—and lay down like a child at the bidding of his mother. And not long before he breathed his last, as an elder son of the general sat watching by him, he took it into his head to get up. The young man argued with him, and putting his hand upon his shoulder, told him he must lie down. Must—there is no such word for me. I will not be controlled sir. But, continued the other, alarmed at the probable consequences, I entreat you, I beg of you to lie down, O, said the governor, this is another affair; that is talking rationally; and he lay down as quiet as if nothing were the matter, although unquestionably delirious at the time. These facts are not mentioned lightly—they help to show the man's character; he would not be dealt with by any body, or any thing, to the abridgment of his liberty. No outrage affected him in health like that of one person daring to exercise improper dominion over another. And weak though he was—a small man of a slight frame, he would have resisted even to death the oppression of brute force over any body. But the last scene of all was yet more striking—he addressed the troops in eloquent and powerful language, though it was occasionally incoherent; and the last words he spoke were—Gentlemen, I call you all to witness that I die in the presence of Franklin—after which he appeared to forget himself—to sink into a lethargy—and then he revived, and added, as if communing with a congress of shadows—A sacred and solemn scene. And with this, the spirit of the sufferer prepared for departure—and his last hour was an hour of untroubled sleep."

There are many that despise half the world; but if there be any that despise the whole of it, it is because the other half despises them.

MORGAN TRIAL. The trial of Elihu F. Mather, charged with a participation in the abduction of Morgan, came on at the last session of the circuit court in Orleans county, and resulted in the acquittal of Mr. Mather. The trial was the longest ever known in that part of the state; it commenced on the 11th and ended on the 21st instant—having occupied each day from 9 in the morning till 10 at night. The jury rendered their verdict after a deliberation of about three hours. The first six days of the trial were occupied in obtaining a jury. The special counsel made an attempt to exclude two of the panel, because they were free-masons; but, after a full argument, the court decided that the cause was not sufficient; both were, however, subsequently excluded on other grounds. The special counsel was assisted by Albert H. Tracy, the newly elected anti-masonick senator; and though the jury was undoubtedly anti-masonick, they have resolved not to abide by its verdict, but to make out a case and submit it to the decision of the supreme court. The special counsel has heretofore professed himself a neutral; but his unwearied and partisan attempts to exclude masons from the jury look like any thing but impartiality.

LITERARY. We have before us a beautiful little Christmas and New-Years's Gift, called THE YOUTH'S KEEPSAKE. It is just published, by Messrs. Carter and Hendee, of Boston, and is said to have been edited by the Rev. F. W. P. GREENWOOD. It is illustrated with six very pretty engravings, and a number of wood cuts. Among the contributors are the editor, N. P. Willis, Miss Sedgwick, Mrs. Sigourney, Mrs. Gilman of Charleston, S. C., and other highly gifted writers. The Youth's Keepsake, was originally designed for the amusement and instructions of children; some of its contents, however, are not without interest for maturer minds. The Torn Hat, by Willis, (which has already been extracted into a number of publick prints) is the very best thing his muse has produced for a long time. The Child's Wish in June, by Mrs. Gilman, and The Savoyard's Song, (Anonymous) are chaste and pretty effusions. Among the prose articles are many exceedingly well adapted to the improvement of young minds. The Childhood of Jesus, by the editor, and A Short History of Bees, by A Mother, are worthy of particular approbation. There is not, however, in the volume an article that may not be perused with pleasure and profit by a young reader; and we heartily commend The Youth's Keepsake to the patronage of parents and those for whose benefit it is intended. It is on sale at the Bookstore of W. C. Little, 67 State street.

THE THEATRE. It can hardly be expected that we shall enter into a regular and systematic criticism of all the performances which take place at our Theatre. Neither the time nor the space which we may fairly devote to the subject will allow of it. Every citizen is undoubtedly interested in the manner in which places of publick amusement are conducted; for they unquestionably exercise a powerful influence upon the character of society, and exalt it and enlarge the means of happiness, or debase it and extend the dominion of vice and misery, in the proportion that they honestly, faithfully, and zealously pursue their legitimate purposes. But whether it be "the error of the moon," the weather, or something else, it is not the less a fact, that only a very small portion of this community seem to be at all solicitous as to the character or the fate of the drama. We shall not say whether this fact is honourable or dishonourable the city; but every one knows that it is a very common idea that a well conducted and well supported Theatre is an evidence of intelligence and liberality; and without attempting to argue the contrary from the contrary, we honestly wish that matters were otherwise than they are.

During the past week there have been some excellent plays presented—some of them not only interesting, but efficient agents in the cause of virtue.

On Monday evening was performed the tragedy of The Gamester. We were not present, but are informed that Beverly by Mr. Webb, Stukely by Mr. Duffy, and Mrs. Beverly by Mrs. Barnes (the most excellent actress, in tragedy, we think, in the country), were well sustained.

On Tuesday evening, Speed the Plough, and Simpson & Co. The part of Farmer Ashfield, by Mr. Roberts, was excellent, we have no desire to see it done better. Mr. Webb appeared as Sir Phillip Blanford. This gentleman has few if any superiors in the serious parts of genteel comedy, and his performance of this evening fully sustained the high opinion of his friends. Sir Able Handy, by Mr. Page, was good, and we should have esteemed it better, had we not been already acquainted with his tenacious adherence to one walk, one set of gestures, and one cadence. Bob Handy, by Mr. Duffy was well conceived and executed with spirit. Mr. Forest, as Henry, displayed much feeling and acquitted himself with credit, throughout. The female characters, particularly Dame Ashfield, by Mrs. Walstein, were well done. The farce went off with spirit, with Miss Emery in Mrs. Simpson, and Mrs. Stone in Mrs. Bromley.

On Wednesday evening The Soldier's Daughter, and Theresa. Timothy Quint, by Mr. Roberts, was quaint enough, in all conscience—the man looked as if he never had a smile upon his countenance. The Widow Cheerly, by Mrs. Barnes, was lively, liberal, cheerful, and just as she should be. The other characters in the play were well sustained; particularly Malfort, jr. by Mr. Webb. In the afterpiece, Mrs. Barnes personated the innocent and persecuted orphan with the same success which almost invariably attends her performances. Mr. Duffy's Carwin was passable, and in some scenes very successful, but, taken as a whole, it was not so good as some of his other personations.

On Thursday evening Rob Roy was repeated, with a change only in the part of major Galbraith, which was performed by Mr. H. Knight—this is an improvement. The farce was a new one for this city—Master's Rival. We have no time to speak of the plot, nor particularly of the performance; it went off with spirit, and Paul Shack by Mr. Vernon, Peter Shack, by Mr. H. Knight, Mr. Aldgate, by Mr. Page, and Tibby Postlethwaite, by Mrs. Vernon, were very well done.

Last evening a new drama was produced, called The Lear of Private Life. We did not see the whole of it, but from what we did see of it, we think the author had too much business upon his hands. The first half is too much hurried, rather heavy, and not very natural. The denouement is happy, and the plot has a moral. Mrs. Barnes played a part that she did not seem to like much, and the whole performance was liable to objections which may be urged with more justice against a second representation, should they then exist.

Miss Emery will take her benefit this evening—her bill is a very attractive one.

Mr. Roberts' benefit will take place on Monday evening. The plays announced are Richard III. and Master's Rival. Richard and Paul Shack by Mr. Roberts.

Our readers must not forget that Thanksgiving will take place in this state on Thursday next. The anti-masonick oracle in this city is out against it—which is very proper, the whole posse of proscriptionists having made over their little souls to the arch-fiend, long ago.

METHODISM AND ANTI-MASONRY. The following preamble and resolutions were adopted at a recent meeting of the New-England Methodist Conference, held at Portsmouth, New-Hampshire. They contain the sentiments of a vast majority of that numerous and exemplary sect throughout the Union, and express a determination not to suffer the church to be made partizans in the proscriptive and anti-christian warfare which is now carried on by the vicious against the masonick institution.

Whereas, much agitation is at this time experienced in different sections of the country on the subject of speculating freemasonry, and in defiance with it, and the considerations put upon it, are productive of much evil to the church of Christ and the community at large; therefore,

Resolved, by the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church—

1. That we will have no connection, whatever, with the speculating; and this Conference will consider any member who disregards this resolution as obnoxious to the authority of the Conference.

2. That we consider ourselves bound as ministers of the gospel of Christ, to avoid all such questions, for organic to masonry, as producing excitements, an excitement in strife among the people.

3. That we hereby earnestly exhort our people throughout this Conference, to pursue the things whereby one may edify another, by mutual forbearance and Christian candour, and that while we disclaim, on our part, all connection with freemasonry, they on theirs, are exhorted and affectionately advised to receive such preachers as in the Providence of God shall be appointed to labour among them, whether they have been masons or otherwise—not as partizans on either side of this perplexing question, but as they profess to be, and as they hope by their spirit and labours to prove themselves to be, the ministers of Jesus Christ.

THE LAST THROES OF MALIGNANCY. The "poor forsaken" anties of Madison county, finding that they are going down hill, at a pace that threatens them with speedy political annihilation, have put all their desperate faculties in operation, to appropriate to their own use such of the "loaves and fishes" as unfortunately still remain within their reach. The "whole hog" board of supervisors of that county last week removed from office the county treasurer, and the superintendents of the almshouse; and delivered these public trusts over to the clutches of a few of their brother "patriots." The proscripted officers were not, we understand, guilty of the heinous offence of being masons, and we are not sure that they had any particular claims upon the elegant title of "jacks," but they were honest and responsible men, and consequently not the most proper persons in the world to do the dirty work of anti-masonry. In taking the poor house into their keeping, the anties undoubtedly had in view the future necessities of their party: the act may therefore be ascribed to a desire to provide for "the household of their faith." The treasurer was removed to make room for a man who, according to the Madison Observer and Recorder, has done little else than visit taverns, for ten or twelve years past. By one means or another he once obtained the office of crier of the county court; but having collected the judges' fees, and kept them, he was turned out: and loving the tavern, or some other place, rather too fervently for the public good, he was discharged from the office of librarian in the village of Morrisville because he neglected his duties! No one can doubt that such a man is just the one to take care of the people's money in a purely anti-masonick manner.

Dr. GREENE, late editor of the Berkshire American, whose humorous originality has gained him a high reputation with the reading public, has, in conjunction with a Mr. Clark, commenced in the city of New-York, a weekly publication, under the title of THE CONSTELLATION. From the size and neatness of the sheet, we doubt not that it is issued under favourable auspices; and from the character of its contents and the talents of the Doctor, we are confident it will meet with ready and ample encouragement.

We have received five or six numbers of The Dramatic Mirror, published daily, by John H. Eastburn, 60 Congress street, Boston. It contains "critical remarks on the performances of every night, in the city of Boston, with bills of the play." The critiques are written with much ability, and the only objection urged against them is, that they are sometimes sufficiently severe—a fault which editors are seldom guilty of when treating upon the same subject. The price of The Mirror is one dollar a month, in advance.

We have received the second number of The World in a Nutshell, a quizzical little thing, published at Portland, Maine. The editors are good natured wags, if we may judge from the specimen we have of them. The Nutshell, before us makes several attempts to burlesque the style of John Neal.

We have received also from Portland, Maine, a number of the Family Visitor, conducted by Mr. Seba Smith. This, too, is a Tom Thumb sort of affair, in appearance, but is nevertheless very creditable to Mr. Smith's head.

Albany Institute. At a special meeting of the Albany Institute, held November 23, 1-29, the following letter from Charles A. Clinton, esq. to Dr. T. Romeyn Beck, was presented and read.

"New-York, November 6, 1829.
"Dear Sir—I have recently purchased a statue of my father, by Mr. Launiz of Rome, a young artist of great merit. I cannot dispose of it in a manner more gratifying to my feelings, than to present it to the Albany Institute; which I request you to do in my name.
"With great regard, sincerely yours,
"C. A. CLINTON."

"To Dr. T. Romeyn Beck, Albany."

Whereupon the following resolutions were unanimously adopted—
Resolved, that the thanks of the Institute be presented to Charles A. Clinton, esq. for the donation of the beautiful statue of his illustrious father; which, while it presents an interesting example of skill in the due art, at the same time exhibits a vivid image of an individual whose memory is affectionately cherished by the members of this society.

Resolved, that this society will place the statue in a conspicuous place in one of the rooms of the society, in the Albany Academy.

Resolved, that the corresponding secretaries communicate the foregoing resolutions to Mr. Clinton; and that the same be published in the newspapers of this city.

Anti-Masonick Calculations. If the Livingston Register does not mean to lead its readers astray, it would do well to adhere a little closer to facts. In speaking of the election of speaker of the Pennsylvania assembly, it says "N. Middeworth received twenty-four votes out of 90. This shows the number of anti-masons that were elected in that state to the legislature." In Niles' Register of Nov. 14, the final vote for speaker is given thus—"for Mr. Smith, forty six, Samuel W. Crum, twenty eight, Mr. Middeworth, thirteen, Henry Peiken, three." This clearly was the vote which tested the strength of anti-masonry; and this corresponds with the statements in the Pennsylvania papers as to the election, the thirteen were elected.

In this state, the Register claims the elected members of Columbia county as anti-masons. It might as well claim the members of any other county. These members were regularly nominated and elected by the republican party, having received an average majority of about 75% votes. Becker, the anti-masonick candidate for senator, received in the whole county of Columbia 329 votes. And yet the Solomons of anti-masonry say the ticket with 750 majority could not have been elected without their votes!

The Register also says—"We perceive their majorities in the eastern counties are generally small." It is very evident that this editor, if he looks to the east, does not see them as they are. The third senate district has given 11,000 republican majority—the fifth nearly 6000—the sixth more than 5000—and the seventh, more than 3000. In the fifth and seventh senate districts, where the anti-masons succeeded last year, the republican gain is 10,700 votes. And in the fourth district, Lieutenant Governor Cray is 6333 votes behind the republican candidate, color of Gore, and 3434 less than Livingston, the Adams candidate. Yet the keen perception of the editor of the Livingston Register enables him to "perceive that the majorities in the eastern counties are very small!"

This veracious paper at Albany, last year, gave "more than 6000 majority over the anti-masonick ticket"—and adds, "this year it is reduced to 2000." Now it is well known that the fair test last year, in Onondaga, was between Judge Mosely, nominated by the republicans, and Mr. Mather, nominated by the anti-masons, as candidates for the senate—and by the official canvass it appears that Judge Mosely had 3942 votes, and Mr. Mather 3623—being a majority over the anti-masonick ticket of 317. This year, Mr. Armstrong, the republican candidate for the senate, has 5000 majority over Mr. Brum, the anti-masonick candidate—being a republican gain, in that county, of 2833. In stating this year's majority at 2000, the editor must have innocently erred—but in magnifying the majority of last year in order to give the appearance of a great anti-masonick gain, if he was not deceived himself, he must have intended to deceive others.

To cap the climax, this self or very modestly charges his opponents with "misrepresentation and falsehood."

King Rothschild! The following curious extract, says the London Court Journal, is from a private letter from Smyrna. We give it without note or comment—"The confidence of the children of Israel in the words of the prophet has not been in vain; the temple of Solomon will be restored in all its splendour. Baron Rothschild, who was accused of having gone to Rome to abjure the faith of his fathers, has actually passed through that city on his way to Constantinople, where he is about to negotiate a loan with the Porte. It is stated on good authority that Baron Rothschild has engaged to furnish the Sultan the enormous sum of 350,000,000 piastres, at three instalments, without interest, on condition of the Sultan's engaging for himself and his successors, to yield to Baron Rothschild forever, the sovereignty of Jerusalem, and the territory of ancient Palestine, which was occupied by the twelve tribes. The Baron's intention is, to grant to the rich capitalists who are scattered about in different parts of the world, portions of that fine country, where he proposes to establish seigniorial rights, and to give them, as far as possible, their ancient and sacred laws."

"Thus the descendants of the Hebrews will at length have a country, and every friend of humanity must rejoice at the happy event. The poor Jews will cease to be the victims of oppression and injustice. Glory to the great Baron Rothschild, who makes so noble a use of his talents."

"A little army being judged necessary for the restored kingdom, measures have been taken for recruiting it out of the wrecks of the Jewish hallelujah raised in Holland by Louis Bonaparte. All the Israelites who were employed in the various departments of the Dutch Administration are to obtain superior posts under the government of Jerusalem, and the expenses of their journey are to be paid them in advance."

It is with the most unfeigned and heartfelt regret that we have to record the death, in St. Thomas, West India, of JAMES WILLIAM MILLER, former editor of the Boston Literary Gazette, and one of the sweetest poets New England has produced.

Like too many of the sons of genius—whose feelings are lifted up from the dull realm of life, and from whose dazzled vision the paths of worldly prosperity are hidden—Mr. Miller had become embarrassed in his prospects; and to ameliorate them, went in command of a trading vessel to Liverpool, whence he sailed to St. Thomas, and after a brief illness, accelerated by depression of mind, went from a world of sorrow to the bosom of his God.

Mr. Miller was in the bloom of life: and was by the united endowments of nature and art, one of the most accomplished and fascinating of men. His friends—and he had many—have by means of his death, found in their hearts, an "aching void"; society has lost a cherished ornament; and the temple of our country's literature, one of its holiest worshippers.

Proc. Phœnix.

Poor Sam Patch was for several years a mule spinner in Messrs. T. Green and Sons' factory in Pawtucket. He commenced his jumping there, from the bridge and the yellow factory. Subsequently he went to the Patterson factories, where his jumping attracted much attention, and he gave up mule spinning for this idle employment, until his vaulting ambition overleaped itself, and the loss of his life has been the consequence. Sam is less to be blamed than those who encouraged him to exhibit his feats. His mother resides in Pawtucket. It is said that he requested the contributions made at his last jump should be sent to her, and it is hoped the request will be complied with. [Proc. Daily Ad.]

It is calculated that Samuel Patch, in falling 125 feet, must have reached the water in about three seconds; and supposing he weighed 100 pounds, must have struck the water with a momentum equal to 8000 pounds.

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED. The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgments for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND FÉTTÉE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any other attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Fettee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself, with the size, strength and convenience of the ordinary four-poster Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlor Sofa or Fettee. The bed and lounge are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and with out removing them from their place on the rackings. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlor fire—to boarding-house keepers—to masters of a vessel—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfect invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 123 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to serve all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to combine comfort and economy. POETRY.

From the Ladies' Magazine, for November.

NOVEMBER.

BY MRS. HALE.

Borne on a car of storm-wrought gloom,
And ushered by the tempest's song,
Her robe like mist from caverned tomb,
November sweeps along.

She is a very tyrant throned
—Her subject days are sad with fear;
Their brightness veiled, and voices toned
Like mourners round a bier.

By terrors would she prove her sway,
And make all nature feel her power;
While from our grasp she rends away
Some treasures every hour.

The leaf, she can not tear, is strown,
And every little flower she finds,
Spared by the frost, with ruthless frown,
She scatters to the winds.

And this is why we dread her chain,—
She wields her sceptre to destroy,
While summer's gentle, generous reign
We hail with songs of joy.

A moral nature ever blends—
And thus the season's tones express
How love beneficence attends,
And hate on selfishness.

The selfish, like November, gather
The clouds of fear and storms of wrath,
And by their cruel coldness wither
Hearts that would bless their path.

Hast thou ne'er dreamed, "were fortune mine—
How I would use the glorious power!
I'd bid the sun of bounty shine,
And raise each drooping flower!

How blest to brighten sorrow's face,
And drive despair's dark griefs away,
And see the orphan's tears give place
To hope's benignant ray!"

But dreamer—while such fancies glowed,
And winter's storms were gathering near—
Didst thou seek misery's chill abode,
And give—the pining tear?

From the Providence Patriot and Columbian Phoenix.

THE GRAVE.

BY J. O. ROCKWELL.

Come with me, thou child of sadness,
Mourning for thy loved one, dead,
And a ray of shadowed gladness
Gather from her quiet bed:
Sorrow there their wings are furling,
And the playing sunbeams sleep,
And the rose's leaves are curling,
And the vines in beauty creep.

Come with me—the sun is stealing
Through the blue and quiet sky;
And the glossy birds are wheeling
With their precious music by;
Yonder leafy woods are bending
To the pressure of the breeze,
Waves and winds their voices blending,
Where the harmonies like these!

Friend of mine! the sacred willows
Whisper where thy loved one rests;
While the generous sun, in billows,
Leaves his radiance on their breasts;
Roses blooming o'er her slumber,
Cheat her for thee, of the sky,
And her spirits pinions cumber
From their journeyings on high.

Werpest thou, sad one, above her?
Tears like those are not for thee,
Nay, as thou didst truly love her,
Let thy thoughts of gladness be!
For her path was dark with sorrow,
But her way is quiet now,
And the shadows of to-morrow
Bring no shadow on her brow!

Didst thou truly love that maiden,
Than thyself of dearer worth?
Look! the sunbeams are not laden
With the shades and cares of earth!
Look! how free they cleave the azure,
Tinging clouds with gold and red;
So thy loved one's spirit-treasure
Started from her dying-bed!

It may be these clustered roses
Keep the essence of her soul—
That the hue which there reposes
From her lips the goddess stole!
Gather them, and love, and cherish,
Keep them, slumbering, by thy head,
And when all their odours perish,
Know her thoughts to heaven are fled!

I would not thy way were lonely,
As I sadly see it is;
I would have thee joyous only
O'er a scene so sweet as this!
Here are flowers and sun; and yonder
Flows a stream with flashing sweep;
And not to the deafening thunder
Wakes thine angel from her sleep.

Calm thy thought! the grief of ages
Would not call the lost one back;
Of that balm which wo assuages
Perish thou not for the lack;
Where yon snowy cloud is driven,
In the sunlit blue afar,
On the confines of high heaven,
Shines thy treasured one—a star!

I'D BE A PARODY.

BY THOMAS HAYNES BAYLEY.

I'd be a Parody, made by a nunny
On some little song with a popular tune,
Not worth a halfpenny, sold for a guinea,
And sung in the Strand by the light of the moon;
I'd never sigh for the sense of a Pliny,
(Who cares for sense at St James' in June?)
I'd be a Parody, made by a nunny,
And sung in the Strand by the light of the moon.

Oh, could I pick up a thought or a stanza,
I'd take a flight on another bard's wings,
Turning his rhymes into extravaganzas,
Laugh at his harp—and then pilfer its strings!
When a poll-parrot can croak the cadenza
A nightingale loves, he supposes he sings!
Oh, never mind, I will pick up a stanza,
Laugh at his harp—and then pilfer its strings!

What though you tell me each metrical puppy
Might make of such parodies two pair a day;
Mocking birds think they obtain for each copy
Paradise pinnies for the parodied lay:
Ladder of fame! if man can't reach the top, he
Is right to sing just as high up as he may;
I'd be a Parody, made by a puppy,
Who makes of such parodies two pair a day!

STANZAS.

(Never before published.)

BY JOHN KEATS.

In a dream-nighted December,
Too happy, happy Tree,
Thy branches ne'er remember
Their green felicity:
The north cannot undo them,
With a sleety whistle through them
Nor frozen thawings glue them
From budding at the prime.

In dream-nighted December,
Too happy, happy Brook,
Thy bubblings ne'er remember
Apollo's summer look;
But with a sweet forgetting,
They stay their crystal fretting,
Never, never petting
About the frozen time.

Ah! would 'twere so with many
A gentle Girl and Boy!
But were there ever any
Withered not at passed joy?
To know the change and feel it,
When there is none to heal it,
Nor numbed sense to steel it,
Was never said in rhyme.

The following example of very clever hyperbole is from the Opolous Gazette.

TO ANN.

Miss Ann, you are, it seems to me,
An essence all ethereal;
The brightest being that can be,
Entirely immaterial.

A pencil tipp'd with solar rays,
Your charms could scarcely blaze;
Contrasted with your beauty's blaze
Bright Sol's a pewter basin.

Transcendent little spark of light,
If rhymes are always true,
An angel is an ugly sprite,
Compared to sylph like you.

SCHOOL BOOKS published by E. & G. MERRIAM, Brookfield, Mass. and for sale by O. STEELE, Bookseller, No. 437 South Main street.

THE AMERICAN READER, containing extracts suited to excite a love of Science and Literature, to refine the taste, and to improve the moral character. Designed for the use of Schools. Price 75 Cents.

Recommendations. Having examined the "American Reader," recently published by E. & G. Merriam, of Brookfield, we cordially recommend it, as a School Book to be used by higher classes in common schools. It contains a judicious, choice, and valuable selection of pieces from standard writers. The moral tendency of the selection we consider highly salutary. While it is calculated to assist the pupil in acquiring the art of reading, it will also furnish him with many valuable hints in regard to the formation of character. The merits of this compilation, when known, will, we think, secure for it extensive patronage.

THOMAS SNELL,

Letter to the Compiler. Hadley Nov. 25, 1859.

Dear Sir,

I have examined the copy of the American Reader you sent me. The selection of the materials appears to be judicious, and I think it possesses merits superior to any work of the kind which has fallen under my observation.

GEO. NICHOLS.

Preceptor of Hopkins Academy.

From the Massachusetts Yeoman. "The American Reader is a handsomely printed duodecimo. It is, the greater part of it, a collection of elegant extracts from some of the best English and American writers, in prose and poetry. Many of the pieces are of very recent publication giving to the book an interest which is wanting in some other similar works. We think it will be found exceedingly well adapted for the use for which it is designed. It is certainly an interesting miscellany for families, and even for literary readers."

From the Boston Recorder. "The character of the book may be estimated by the writers chosen by the compiler. Among the Europeans are Jane Taylor, Mrs. Hemans, Mrs. Ope, H. K. White, Montgomery, B. Barton and Pollok. Among the Americans are W. Irving, Penna, Webster, Giffin, Whippley, Wayland, Dwight, Humphrey, Wilcox, Beecher, White, Mrs. Sigourney and Miss Francis. The whole comprises a very judicious and choice selection."

From a Notice of the Work. "This compilation, in point of moral sentiment, is in our judgment, superior to any recent publication which we have seen. We recommend the work to the early consideration of School Committees, and hope it may be extensively circulated."

POPULAR EXCITEMENTS.

NO. III.

The charges against the early christians which were narrated in my last, proved the precursors to other enormities, to which the heated and disordered state of the public mind was peculiarly favourable. To fan the flame against this sect "which was every where spoken against," the instigators of the popular clamour became so anxiously jealous for the public safety that they charged the christians, collectively, with attempts to subvert the existing authorities by general conflagrations. Calamitous fires and bloody murders were, for a long period, seldom charged upon any other than the christians, whose collective acts these crimes were alleged to be; and their origin was pretendedly traced to the principles and precepts inculcated by that order. In the reign of Diocletian and Galerius, the bed chamber of the former Emperor was twice on fire, and the ingenuity of aspirants seconded by the rage of popular phrenzy, caused great numbers of the christians to be imprisoned, tortured, and finally consigned to the hands of the executioner, as the supposed authors of the desperate deed. Yet, when this phrenzy of feeling, and the more reprehensible selfishness that produced it, had passed away, the historian of the event informs us that the fire was the work of the associate emperor Galerius, who stood prominently forth in the ranks of the persecuting party. The sufferers, upon these occasions, appealed, with all the intrepid serenity of innocence, from the over-varying noise of popular rumour to the more definite forms of specific testimony. They urged that the charges alleged against them were not less devoid of probability than they were destitute of evidence in their support; and, at a time when reason was stilled by a whirlwind of unrestrained passions, they calmly inquired with a commendable candour, whether it was probable, or, in the absence of all proof, if it should be credited that a large society had resolved to dishonour itself in the eyes of its own members; and that a great number of persons, of various ages and rank, should become so far insensible to the fear of death or infamy, as to consent to the violation of those principles which nature and education has combined to imprint most deeply in their minds. But this and similar appeals were ineffectual; for a species of fanaticism was abroad which argument could not approach, and which it was the province of aspirants to perpetuate. The test of investigation was never sought, and rarely allowed, by the abettors of the popular tempest, and as often as the public mind exhibited the faintest signs of returning sanity, recourse was had to high wrought appeals from chosen orators, to the tumultuous assemblies, upon festival and other gala occasions. Upon these occasions, says the language of history, "If the empire had been afflicted by any recent calamity, by a plague, a famine or an unsuccessful war; if the Tiber had, or the Nile had not risen beyond its banks; if the earth had shaken, or if the temperate order of the seasons had been interrupted, the language of the populace was, that the crimes and the impieties of the christians, who were spared by the excessive lenity of the government, had at length provoked the Divine Justice." It was not among a licentious and exasperated populace, that the forms of legal proceedings could be observed; it was not in an amphitheatre stained with the blood of wild beasts and gladiators, that the voice of compassion could be heard. The impatient clamours of the multitude denounced the christians as the enemies of gods and men, doomed them to the severest tortures; and, venturing to accuse, by name, some of the most distinguished of the new sectaries, required, with irresistible vehemence, that they should be instantly apprehended and cast to the lions.

Even the philosophers of the age (so extensively had the infection pervaded the public mind) assumed the unworthy office of directing the blind and furious zeal of persecution; and while the christian might be accused, even by a vagrant or a beggar, of the most enormous crimes, yet he could not obtain permission to lodge a complaint against his oppressor for any injury, however great, that he might have suffered; and thus the whole order of christians stood exposed to the severity, while they were excluded from the benefits of public justice.

The striking similarity of the entire history of this popular excitement, to the one now prevailing, is so palpably obvious as to require but little illustration. There are men now as there were formerly, who readily accuse, without waiting for proof, an entire body of their fellows, embracing those of perhaps every grade in society, of collectively perpetrating the blackest crimes; and if we have not the festive assemblages of the Romans, into whose ears to pour, at an unguarded moment, the deadly poison of suspicion, the gathering together of our population at courts, at our popular elections, or when called upon to perform the rites of sepulchre for a stranger cast dead upon our shores, have all been deemed fit occasions for the demagogue to perform this unhallowed service.

REASON.

NO. IV.

Without dwelling longer upon the factious and reprehensible treatment received by the early Christians, from those whose thirst for public office and power had driven them to the commission of acts which, in less heated moments, they would themselves have condemned, I shall now pass to other portions of history, of dates far more recent than have hitherto engaged our attention. To detail all that could compare with the present excitement, in the annals of our race, would be to write an entire history of man; detached examples, therefore gleaned from the inexhaustible mass of material, are all that can be embraced in my present plan.

We have seen upon what pretensions Christianity, on its first introduction into the world, was opposed: we are now to witness how readily, in after ages, the promoters of popular excitements have seized upon this same christianity, as a means of carrying their schemes into effect. As examples from history, rather than connected history itself, are alone applicable to my plan, I shall pass over the long period of time between the introduction of christianity at Rome, and the accession of Cromwell to the English throne, without availing myself of the rich fund of material which it furnishes for my present investigation. The cause of this man's power was "his peculiar fitness to gain the confidence of the unreflecting, but what was mean, vulgar, or ridiculous, in his character." Such is the language by which the historian has designated a man who, when he had raised the storm of civil commotion by appealing, successively, to religion, prejudice, and passions, was able to mount the whirlwind and, for a time, direct its devastations. Later periods in the history of the English nation furnish lucid demonstration of the evil consequences of popular commotions, when moved by principles such as sustain their present one. The famous commotion of the populace in 1678, is well known, and its history is replete with evil. The "guardians of the public good," having been long preparing the public mind for suspicion, at length found its temperament suited to their purpose; and "while in this timorous, jealous disposition, the cry of a plot, all of a sudden struck the people's ears: they were awakened from their slumber; and, like men affrighted, and in the dark, took every figure for a spectre. The terror of each man became the source of terror to others; and an unusual panick being diffused, reason and argument, and common sense, and common humanity, lost all influence over them. From this disposition of men's minds we are to account for the progress of the Popish Plot, and the credit given to it; an event which would otherwise appear prodigious, and altogether inexplicable." The mover of this commotion was one Oates, a man who was alike despised and despicable. Previously to his assuming the guardianship of the public morals, and the protectorate of the national freedom, he had been once indicted for perjury, but was not convicted; and afterwards dismissed from a station in the national fleet, for conviction of an unnatural practice not to be named. His whole life was one mingled scene of filthy and unrestrained depravity. He lived, at the time of his disclosure, in both obscurity and want; and still "this man, in whose breast was lodged a secret [the plot], involving the fate of Kings and Kingdoms, was allowed to remain in such necessity that a friend was obliged to supply him with daily bread; and it was a joyful surprise to him, when he heard that the council was, at last, disposed to take some notice of his intelligence." Such was the man. The nature of his information was, that a secret society had been formed among the Catholics, for the purpose of murdering the king and subverting the civil and religious institutions of the country. Among other statements, he said that two persons had been employed by this confederacy to shoot the king, with silver bullets; that one of them was to receive fifteen hundred pounds, in money; and the other, being a pious man, was to be rewarded with thirty thousand masses, which, estimating them at one shilling each, would amount to the same value. In moments of dispassionate reflection, the rational man can scarcely give credence to the fact that so idle inventions as these could be credited; but even after the detection of Oates' imposition, and the discovery that he had never seen those persons with whom he had claimed the closest acquaintance, and consequently that his whole story was a fabrication, having nothing more to give rise to it than an assault committed on two or three persons, from which he might possibly have gathered his hint, still the story was kept alive by designing men, and the credulous were long after taxed with donations to a fund to be expended in repelling the evil consequences of a plot which never existed.

The death of a magistrate, by the hands of a ruffian, at a time when this disturbance was about to subside, gave fresh occasion to the guardians of public good once more to excite the honest populace. The murder was instantly recognized, by designing men, as a part of the plot, which was to be carried into immediate execution by the catholics. "The voice of the nation united against that proscribed sect, and each hour teemed with new rumours and surmises. Invasions from abroad, insurrections at home, even private murders and poisonings were constantly apprehended. To deny the reality of the plot, was to be an accomplice; to hesitate was criminal; royalist, republican, churchman, secretary, courtier, patriot; all parties concurred in the illusion." "To propagate the popular phrensy, several artificers were employed. The dead body of the murdered magistrate was carried into London, attended by vast multitudes. It was publicly exposed in the streets, and viewed by all ranks of men; and every one who saw it went away inflamed, as well as by mutual contagion of sentiments as by the dismal spectacle itself. The funeral pomp was celebrated with great parade. The corpse was conducted through the chief streets of the city; seventy-two clergymen marched before; above one thousand people of distinction followed after; and at the funeral sermon, two able bodied divines mounted the pulpit, and stood upon each side of the preacher, lest, in paying the last duties to this unhappy magistrate, he should, before the whole people, be murdered by the papists." "At such a time," observes the historian, in conclusion, "and in such a state of public feeling, the voice of reason could no more be heard than a whisper in the midst of a most violent tornado."

If the historical details which are here given of the funeral and other ceremonies attendant upon the death of this magistrate, shall appear, at first impression too strikingly similar to those in the case of Timothy Munroe, a moment's reflection will enable the reader to account for the coincidence by the fact, that human nature is now what it ever has been; and that, consequently, if men who could hope for preferment by no justifiable means, were successful in deceptions of this character, in 1678, all surprise ceases when we advert to the mingled protestations of private grief and of public danger, which so recently resounded at the mouth of Oak Orchard Creek.

REASON.

NO. V.

After the historical transactions detailed in my last, as connected with the popish plot, the public mind was scarcely suffered to cool, ere it was again assailed. "The nation had gotten so much into the vein of credulity, and every accessions villain was so much incited by the success of Oates, that the people were not allowed to remain in tranquillity. There was one Dangerfield, a fellow who had been burned in the hand for crimes, transported, whipped, pilloried four times, fined, or cheated, outlawed for felony, convicted for coining, and exposed to all the public infamy which the laws could inflict on the basest and most shameful enormities. The credulity of the people and the humour of the times, enabled reer this man to become a person of consequence. He was the author of a new incident, entitled the meal tub plot, from the place where some papers relating to it were found." This miserable being, for want perhaps of native invention, adopted for his general plan the scheme of Oates, namely, a secret society among the Catholics, for purposes of murder, conflagration and tyranny. The object of the wretched contriver of this affair, was bread; but political partisans, for widely different purposes, entered with spirit into its support, and strenuously maintained the general existence of the plot, while they industriously aided in establishing its numerous details. By the influence of private, but aspiring individuals, it was finally carried into parliament, and the hitherto quiet halls of legislation were subjected to the disgraceful influence of this "culprits' fable." The house of Commons, by a heavy vote, declared the existence of the plot in its fullest extent "and, in order the more to terrify the people, they even asserted that, notwithstanding the discovery, the plot still subsisted." They even went so far as to expel two members of their own body for presuming to avow a disbelief in the existence of the iniquitous combination; and they lamented, in official walling, the death of a wretch named Bedloe, whom they called a national witness. This person had been a witness in the Oates affair, when he gave positive testimony against some of the first men of the nation. Failing sick, at Bristol, he sent for the Chief Justice, and to him confessed that all he had sworn against the Queen and a Duke he mentioned, was false, but that the remainder of his story was true. This interview was closed on Bedloe's part, by a request for money, to reward his services. He died soon after: "and," says Hume, "the whole party triumphed, extremely, in these circumstances of his death; as if such a testimony could be deemed the affirmation of a dying man; as if his confession of perjury in some instances, could assure his veracity in the rest; and, as if the perseverance of one prodigal could outweigh the last words of so many men, guilty of no crime but that of popery."

Dangerfield's story had now become so important to the political preference of those who were kindly labouring to preserve the nation from plots and ruin, that "the public good" required them to remove, if possible, some portion of the load of infamy which rested so heavily upon its author, in order, if possible to give greater currency to the story itself, and to gain believers from that portion of community whose standing in society would render them serviceable, and whose doubts were still wholly unconquered. For this purpose every effort was made to restore to Dangerfield so much of his lost reputation as would render him a competent witness. For this purpose, a host of informers, less known, and of course, apparently less infamous, was assembled, and some of them corroborated the statements of the man who could not be sworn. The testimony of these men, "however frivolous or absurd, met with a favourable reception: the King was applied to, in their behalf, for pardons and pardons, their narratives were printed, with that sanction which arose from the approbation of the house; and one of them, a Dr. Tongue, was recommended for the first considerable church preferment, which should become vacant. Considering men's determined resolution to believe, instead of wondering that palpable falsehood should be maintained by witnesses, it may justly appear surprising that no better evidence was ever produced."

The public ear becoming, at length, wearied with the monotonous cry of secret society, plots and treason, it was found necessary to proceed to extremities, or give up the delusion. The former course was preferred: Oates was again sought out in his native obscurity, and, with others, was brought, in 1680, to charge Viscount Stafford with participating in the plot: which put him upon trial, as a prisoner of state. He proved, by witnesses wholly above suspicion, that he was not in the guile at the times specified; and, in short, that the entire story of his guilt or of his knowledge of the alleged crimes, was fabricated by his accusers or their associates. But "the torrent of prejudice was still running furiously; reason was exiled from her dwelling; malignant wickedness, on the one hand, and criminal credulity upon the other, destroyed the last hope of the innocent victim, and he paid the forfeit of his head for the misfortune of having lived at a time when virtue had no protector, and honesty was sacrificed upon the altar of political preference." Such, in this instance, was the dreadful consequence of the causes I have enumerated. This tragical scene, however, opened the eyes of the populace, who now accused themselves of having acted too readily, and such was its effect that the charm was broken, and "Stafford's is the last blood which was shed on account of the popish plot: an incident which, for the credit of the nation, it were better to bury in eternal oblivion; but which it is necessary to perpetuate, as well to maintain the truth of history, as to warn, if possible, posterity, and all mankind, never again to fall into so shameful and barbarous a delusion."

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

WATER.

Health can as little be supported without pure water, as without pure air. Where either these fluids is deteriorated by admixture with foreign matters, disease will be a common if not constant resident. The ancients were well aware of this fact, when they went to such expense in procuring good water from great distance. At this day Rome, though fallen from her high estate, is supplied with copious streams of water, conveyed for many miles, by means of aqueducts, built in her days of early splendour and dominion. While we smile with mingled feelings of pity and contempt, at the ancient Romans, who were often regulated by the opinions of the augurs and soothsayers, in their military expeditions and important transactions, we ought not to forget that at other times, their consulting the appearances presented in animals, was an evidence of practical wisdom, when this process was conducted with a view of ascertaining the state of the air and water; in living beings. Vitruvius informs us that the livers and spleens of animals were inspected, in order to judge from them of the nature of the waters of a country, and the salubrity of its alimentary productions and to regulate accordingly their choice of sites for the construction of their cities. The size and bad state of the above mentioned organs, are in fact a pretty certain sign of the insalubrity of the pastures, and of the bad quality of the waters, which, especially if they be stagnant, produce in cows, and above all, in sheep, fatal diseases, the seat of which is often in the liver: the rot, for example, is a disease of this organ, which frequently destroys whole flocks, in marshy countries. The inhabitants of a country exposed to the double influence of bad water and impure air, suffer in a similar manner. The latter will even be comparatively innocuous, if pains be taken to improve the quality of the former. Families, and military officers in quarters in the island of Zealand, that grave of Holland, have enjoyed good health throughout the year, though exposed as usual to atmospheric distemperatures—merely by using water carefully filtered, or to which light wines had been added.

Painfully and unseemly eruptions of the skin, indigestion in its worst forms, and scurvy, have all been caused by the long use of bad water, and have been promptly cured by a substitution of this beverage in a purer state.

The common division into soft and hard is generally recognised in speaking of water, when used for domestic purposes and the arts. The first, or soft, rain, river, and snow water; the second, or hard, is that generally obtained from springs and wells. Water perfectly pure, that is, free from all mineral or saline impregnation, is scarcely ever met with in nature. Good water ought to be perfectly inodorous, transparent, and give no other taste than that of softness: it should readily mix with soap, so as to form a homogenous, opaline fluid, which will not be decomposed for several hours: when poured out of one vessel into another, it should send out air-bubbles: peas, beans, and other pulse, and also the fibres of animal substances, ought to be more readily softened in it by boiling, than they would be in hard water. The taste of pure rain and river water, as contrasted with the rapidness of that which has been boiled and distilled, proceeds from its containing atmospheric and fixed air, that is to say, the air such as we commonly breathe, and that which is given out in the process of fermentation, and which we esteem so grateful in artificial mineral or soda water, as it is often called. A hundred cubic inches of good river water will contain about 2 1-4 of carbonic acid, (fixed air) and 1 1-4 of common (atmospheric) air. These are necessary ingredients in water to be used as a beverage; hence if we boil or distil it, to clear it of earthy matters and salts, or obtain it from melted snow and ice, we must, in order that it may lose its rapidness and recover its taste, expose a large surface of it to the air, or agitate it by free stirring. River water, even of the best quality, will contain different kinds of salts, but in such very minute portions, that it is not necessary to take any account of them, except in chemical experiments.

Almost all spring waters possess the property termed hardness, in a great or less degree. This depends chiefly on their holding in solution super-carbonate of lime, (chalk) or sulphate of lime, (plaster of Paris) or both. A very small proportion of one of these salts is sufficient to give the water the character of hardness, whereby it curdles in place of dissolving, or intimately mixing with soap. Mr. Dalton, the celebrated chemist, has shown that one grain of sulphate of lime contained in two thousand times its weight of water, converts it into the hardest spring water that is commonly met with.

The purest river water is that which runs over a gravelly or rocky bed, and with a swift course. The purest springs are those which occur in primitive rocks, or beds of gravel, or which filter through sand in silicious strata.

We shall speak in a future number of the peculiar properties and impregnations of the waters of some of the most celebrated rivers, and of those obtained from springs, rain, and snow; and also of the different methods employed to soften and purify hard and muddy waters.

Charles the Fifth asked Michael Angelo, one day, in what estimation he held Albert Durer; when, with all the noble frankness of a man of genius, who knows how to appreciate superior talents, he instantly replied—"I esteem him so highly, that I would, if I were not Michael Angelo, much rather be Albert Durer than even the Emperor Charles V."

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

Hidalgo continued his advance to the capital, and overthrew a hostile body, in which Iturbide held command, on the road from Toluca. But after advancing within sight of Mexico, he retired without an effort. In his retreat he encountered Calleja, the Spanish general, who had pressed on his rear with a considerable regular force. In the plain of Aculco, on the 7th November, 1810, Calleja was completely victorious, and Hidalgo hastily fell back on Valladolid, while Allende, his second in command, took the road to Guanajuato. On being compelled to abandon this town, a series of atrocious murders was commenced by the insurgents, which led to meet terrific retaliation on the part of the Spaniards. Two hundred and forty-nine Europeans were murdered in cold blood on the very morning that the Spanish general entered the town. He immediately issued orders to give no quarter; but he soon retracted them, and eventually contented himself with decimating the inhabitants. Hidalgo retired to Guadalajara, where he, too, murdered between seven and eight hundred Europeans, with a secrecy that rendered the act more revolting. A second battle, at the bridge of Calderon, was equally unfortunate for the insurgents with that of Aculco, although the Indians fought better. The levies were then left under the command of a new chief, Don Ignacio Lopez Rayon; and Hidalgo, with his three original colleagues, determined on entering the United States, for the purpose of completing their military stores. On the 21st March, 1811, when on the road, they were apprehended, through the treachery of a former associate, Don Ignacio Elizondo. Their trial, which was protracted till July, terminated in their conviction and subsequent execution.

Rayon retained his command, and while insurrectionary movements were making in various quarters, proceeded to establish a Junta of Government, which was effected, at Zitacuaro, on the 10th September, 1811—within less than twelve months after Hidalgo's first rising. This Junta professed a readiness to acknowledge Ferdinand VII. as their sovereign, provided he would establish himself in Mexico; but there is reason to believe that the professions thus made were "false and hollow." One of the most memorable acts of this body was to draw up and transmit a manifesto to the Viceroy, containing proposals either for peace or war; but it was unavailing, and the capture of Zitacuaro on the 2d January, 1812, by General Calleja, then Conde de Calderon, obliged the members to make a hasty retreat to Saltillo.

While these proceedings were going on in the north, as has been already said, Morelos, the Parish Priest of Necupetaro who had been brooding over the wrongs of his country, had declared in favour of the insurgents; and in October, 1810, left Valladolid with a commission from Hidalgo as Captain General of the South Western Provinces, for which he set off, accompanied by a few servants armed with six muskets and some old lances. His forces were strengthened by the accession of a body of African slaves, and the declaration of two brothers Jose and Antonio Galeana, for the cause of independence. Within a month, his small army was increased to a thousand men, with whom he had advanced to and invested Acapulco, so long the resort of the galleons from Manilla. A victory obtained on his way thither, in a night attack, over the Spanish commandant, inspired his raw levies with confidence, and made him master of a most seasonable supply of the munitions of war, and of a considerable sum of money.

Fresh adherents flocked to his standard; among whom were two Bravos and the Priest Melaneros, who afterwards made a distinguished figure during the short but brilliant career of his chief. Success crowned his arms during a succession of engagements; so that by the month of January, 1812, the insurgents had arrived at and captured Tlaxco, within twenty five leagues of the capital. In another month, the advanced guard arrived at Chalco, distant not more than three leagues from it.

Calderon having been recalled from the north, where he had succeeded in re-establishing the Spanish supremacy, prepared to attack this formidable assailant. Morelos determined to encounter him at a small open town, Cuantla Amilpas, about twenty-two leagues from the capital. Calderon's first attack was made on the 19th February, and successfully repelled; but after maintaining a gallant though unavailing defence till the 2d May, being pressed by famine and disease, Morelos conducted his troops in safety between the Spanish batteries, and after dispersing them, ordered a rendezvous, of the whole at Izucar; this last feat was achieved with a loss of only seventeen men—but, unfortunately, in that number was Don Leonardo Bravo, whose fate excited pity for himself, and admiration of the chivalrous generosity for his son, the present General Don Nicolas Bravo. According to the usual practice at that time, Don Leonardo was sentenced to die: his son offered in exchange for him 300 Spaniards, then his prisoners; his offer was refused, and the unhappy parent suffered his punishment. His son instantly liberated his captives, for fear he should be tempted to retaliate in the same spirit that had influenced his enemies.

Morelos, having recruited his forces, successively defeated some Spanish corps, occupied Tehuacan and Orizava, and by the month of November was on his way to Oaxaca. We have omitted to state in the proper place, that at the commencement of the siege of Cuantla Amilpas, General Victoria, afterwards first President of the Republic—at that time named Don Jose Maria Fernandez—became known. Hereafter we shall have occasion to say something more of him. Morelos, on arriving before the city of Oaxaca, immediately invested it; and his artillery was directed with great success by Don Manuel Mier y Teran, one of the most able among the native officers, though envy and jealousy have hitherto conspired to keep him in the shade. The capture of the city, which was followed by that of Acapulco, facilitated the formation of a National Congress—which was always an object very near to the heart of the revolutionary leader. This assembly, which was composed of the members of the Junta of Zitacuaro, the deputies elected in Oaxaca, and others selected by them to represent the other provinces, opened its sittings on the 13th September, 1813, in the town of Chilpanzingo—by which title it has been distinguished. In two months after the first meeting, the absolute independence of Mexico was formally declared.

While the chief was thus employed, his lieutenants, Bravo and Matamoros, were actively pushing the interests of the cause in the eastern provinces; but the former being at last forced to abandon Vera Cruz, rejoined Morelos in Oaxaca. Matamoros too whose progress had been marked by the most brilliant success, was at last obliged to rejoin his leader, who was then concentrating his forces at Chilpanzingo, in order that he might move on Valladolid, where his communications would be facilitated with the insurgents of the south and the interior, among whom Guerrero (the president elect) had distinguished himself even at that early period. The expedition to Valladolid was most fatal, for there Iturbide, afterwards the liberator of his country, was stationed, and after a severe contest, completely routed the insurgent army. Morelos retreated to Puruaran, where he was again beaten. Matamoros was taken and shot. After this, the bloody system, of reprisals was unrelentingly carried on. This was the commencement of a long series of misfortunes to the republican cause. Another Bravo and Galeana perished by the hands of the executioner; the congress was dispersed; but, undismayed, re-assembled in the forests of Apatzingan, and sanctioned the constitution known by the name of their retreat. Iturbide's activity surprised and nearly annihilated this body.

Morelos, in attempting a junction with Teran and Guerrero, his own force having been reduced to 500 men was surprised by Don Manuel Concha an active Spanish officer, and after vainly seeking death, was taken prisoner. He was brutally used by the soldiery, but Concha behaved to him with the kindness due to a brave man in adversity. He was conveyed to San Augustin de las Cuevas where he was examined by the Oidor Battaller, who had long rendered himself odious to the Creoles, by declaring, that "so long as there was a Manchegan mule or Castilian cobbler in New-Spain, no Creole was fit to govern it." With such a magistrate little ceremony was used, and Morelos was shot on the 22d of December, 1815, dying, as he had lived, with a most dignified firmness. His dying address to his Creator was brief and touching. "Senor, si he obrado bien, tu lo sabes; y si mal, yo mi acojo a tu infinita misericordia." (Lord, if I have done well, thou knowest it; and if ill, I trust to thy infinite mercy.)

TIME FOR SLEEP.

Sleep, "tired nature's sweet restorer," is well known to be essential to the existence of man. Those who are long deprived of a necessary proportion of it, have their health impaired, and not unfrequently the period of their existence abridged.

Many would appear to imagine that provided a certain number of the twenty-four hours be passed in sleep, it matters little how or where such repose is obtained. This, however, is a very gross error. The accommodations of the night, equally with the occupations of the day, exert a very powerful influence upon the health and well-being of the system.

Night is evidently the period appropriated by nature for repose, and general experience has proved that it is the only one during which we can with certainty obtain that sound, sweet, and refreshing slumber, so necessary for the preservation of health. Sleep during the day is, indeed, on many accounts a pernicious practice, which should be carefully avoided, excepting under particular circumstance, of disease, or when a sufficient amount of repose cannot be obtained at the natural periods. This, however, does not apply to infants. For the first months after birth, a healthy child sleeps full two-thirds of its time. This propensity requires to be indulged by day as well as by night; but, with judicious management, it may be brought in a short time, to require and enjoy repose during the latter period only. Young children, when fatigued by exercise, will also, in general, be found inclined to sleep during the day from indulging them in a short repose, under such circumstances, no bad effects can result, provided their clothing be perfectly loose, so that every part of their bodies is freed from bands or ligatures.

The popular maxim, "early to bed and early to rise," is one which should be rigidly observed by every individual. It has been remarked that, in the natural state, the disposition to sleep usually comes on soon after the commencement of darkness; and according to the oldest and most accurate observers, three or four hours sleep before midnight is very nearly as refreshing as double that portion in the morning. Persons who spend the day in manual labour, or active exercise in the open air, with great difficulty keep awake for a few hours after the night has closed in; and this disposition to early sleep is, perhaps, one of the strongest indications of perfect health.

The studious are noted for their disregard of "the regular hours of rest." The solemn stillness of night, inviting to those pursuits which require a fixed attention, and a connected series of thought and reasoning, leads them first into the habit; which is subsequently strengthened by the circumstance of intense application of the mind, uninterrupted by sufficient and appropriate exercise, producing a state of nervous irritability inimical to sleep. Hence the student first to leave his midnight lamp for a couch which he can only occupy in a state of restlessness. Let him, however, relinquish his nocturnal studies, at seek, during the natural period, that repose which his mind and body alike demand—appropriating "the hours of early morn" to study, and the respite of the forenoon to exercise, and we are wellersuaded, that while his progress in the pursuit of knowledge would be in no degree retarded, he will be the gainer, not merely in the enjoyment of more perfect health, but in the increase of clearness and vigour of his intellectual faculties.

It has been very correctly remarked "that the atmosphere of the night is always more vitiated, and consequently less fit for respiration, than that of the day; and as we respire a greater portion of air while awake than in a sleeping state, it follows that from these, independent of other causes, the system is more liable to injury in the former than in the latter state."

Early rising is equally important to the health of the system as early rest. On no account should any one permit himself to again slumber, after the moment of his first awaking in the morning, whether this happen at the early dawn, or before the sun has risen; even though from accident or unavoidable causes he may not have enjoyed his six or eight hours of repose. It is much better to make up the deficiency, if necessary, at some other time, than to attempt taking another nap. Whoever shall accustom himself thus to rise, will enjoy more undisturbed sleep during the night, and awake far more refreshed, than those who indolently slumber all the morning.

Even this second nap is, however, by no means so injurious to health as the practice of continuing in bed of a morning, long after waking; nothing tends, especially in children, and young persons generally, more effectually to unbrace the solids, exhaust the spirits, and thus to undermine the vigour, activity, and health of the system, than such a practice.

Let any one, who has been accustomed to lie in bed till eight or nine o'clock, rise by five or six, spend an hour or two in walking, riding, or any active diversion in the open air, and he will find his spirits more cheerful and serene throughout the day, his appetite more keen, and his body more active and vigorous.

Rees, in his life of Dr. Kippis, attributes the uninterrupted health of the latter, to habits of early rising, as well as to the uniform regularity and temperance to which he had been accustomed from his youth. It may be added, that, however different in other respects may have been the habits of those who have been remarkable for their longevity, they were all early risers.

The habit of early rising is one of great importance in reference to the health of young persons: when commenced in the first years of life, it will be persevered in from choice. "Hence," to use the language of an experienced writer, "while under the eye of parents and guardians, children may be taught to rise constantly at a certain hour, which will render it more easy for them to persevere in the habit, after they are removed from under that controul. If no disease or accident intervene, they will need no further repose than that obtained in their first sleep, which custom will have caused to terminate, of itself, just at the usual hour, and then, if they turn upon the other ear to take a second nap, they will be taught to look upon it as an intemperance, not at all redounding to their credit."

No one should retire to rest immediately after a full meal, or in an agitated state of mind. Indeed, after a light supper, at least two hours ought to elapse before bed-time; and as a requisite for sound and invigorating repose, it is necessary to banish all anxious, gloomy, or depressing ideas and thoughts, and every species of mental exertion. To the same intent, every circumstance calculated to excite the senses should be removed. The pernicious practice, adopted by many, of reading in bed until they fall asleep, is particularly to be avoided. In place of this dangerous expedient to invite sleep, it would be more salutary to walk up and down the room for a few minutes, or to partake of any other gentle exercise. Fortunately, however, the individual who lives a life of temperance and virtue, and partakes daily of sufficient active exercise; requires no opiate to lull him to repose:

"On him the balm of sleep
Of sleep with double nutriment descend."

PRIDE.

Diogenes, being at Olympia, saw at that celebrated festival some young men of Rhodes arrayed most magnificently. Smiling, he exclaimed, "This is pride." Afterwards, meeting with some Lacedaemonians in a mean and sordid dress, he said, "And this also is pride."

THE BETROTHED.

Cynric pursued his way in loneliness and gloom. He had parted from Lucy—perchance—for ever! and was, at that moment, bent upon an adventure, which might end in bloodshed and murder. Lucy was right when she said that he was leagued with fearful men. He was, indeed, connected with a gang of smugglers, whose daring exploits held the inhabitants of the hills in terror, from Aberdowen to Aberdovey,—a wild upland tract extending several miles on the south-east coast of Merioneth-shire. It was to meet these lawless men that he was now hastening: for they had fixed upon that night to run a valuable cargo of spirits. Cynric's acquaintance with these men had been of long standing; and he had frequently connived at their illicit dealings, by allowing them the occasional use of his uncle's barns and outhouses; and it was rumoured among the peasantry, that he had actually been out with them on more than one perilous expedition. It is very certain that he was exceedingly attached to all marine exercises; and it was a strong trait in his character, that he delighted to sail about the beautiful river Maw, in stormy weather. In spring-tides, as soon as there was sufficient water to lift the little skiff, which belonged to his uncle; and, when the wind was blowing hard off the land, alone and unaided, he would seek the middle of the river, and there buffet the breeze in all the daring hardihood of his daring nature; taking about, and sporting hither and thither in imitation of the swift and buoyant circlings of the sea birds by which he was surrounded. In all the mysteries of boating, "Wild Cynric," as he was called, was an especial adept; and at Barmouth, when the hardy fishermen of that little port were afraid to venture out, he has gone over the Bar, and back again, despite their anxious endeavours to restrain him.

It is probable that Cynric's acquaintance with the smugglers would never have ripened into a closer intimacy, but for the unfortunate affair at Duffryn; or some other wild adventure, which would have driven him into concealment. As soon as he knew that there was a warrant out against him, rather than implicate his comrades in the fray, he fled at once to claim the protection of those whom he had himself so often befriended; and this he did the more hastily, in consequence of a quarrel he had recently had with his uncle, respecting Lucy. He was, as may be expected, received with open arms by the gang, who sympathised very cordially in his misfortune, emphatically imprecated his prosecutors, and very heartily wished all magistrates and their minions at the devil.

The place of rendezvous, on the present occasion, was in a wild ravine, just below that most wretched of all wretched hamlets—Llwyngwrl, and about six miles from Garthmeiran. This was a noted haunt of the gang; but it was so inaccessible, that there they were always secure. The ravine ran up from the water's edge between two lofty and rugged ridges of rock, terminating at the base of a very abrupt and lofty cliff, round which wound a path so narrow, that none but a wild goat, or a practised cragsman could safely tread it. At high water the tide ran up the ravine to a considerable extent; and a broad ledge of rock on each side served as a very convenient quay for the purposes of the smugglers. Nature still farther contributed to their convenience by the formation of a natural cave or hollow in the rock on one side of the ravine, which no great labour enlarged, so that it constituted a habitation, and a storehouse admirably calculated for its lawless occupants.

There was a wild beauty in this lonely spot, on the night to which we have referred. As the night advanced, the tide rapidly increased; and with it the wind arose, at first, moaning plaintively among the rocks, and then rushing in swift gusts up the ravine, and dashing the foaming breakers against its rugged boundaries. The smugglers had lighted torches, the bickering flames of which, as they were blown about by the wind, cast a fitful and lurid glare upon the uncouth forms that were moving about by the waterside. At the mouth of the cave, which was just beyond the high water-mark, they had kindled a bonfire of brushwood and gorse, and this crackled and blazed, as it was fanned by the night wind, which sent the flame higher and stronger as the fuel became more extensively kindled. The vessel, a small schooner, called "The Kite," was moored as high up the ravine as the water would allow, with her cargo on board, and every thing ready for sailing at a moment's notice; and the creaking of her timbers, mingled with the screams of the cormorants and sea-gulls, did not detract aught from the wildness of the scene.

The anxiety for Cynric's arrival was increased as the hour of embarkation drew near. Already was the tide at the full, before he was seen slowly descending the path which led from the hills to the defile; and no sooner had they caught a glimpse of his darkened figure, than the vessel was instantly manned; and in less than five minutes, Cynric and his crew being all on board, she was under weigh, with all her canvass crowded, and right before the wind, sending the spray from her bows, as she bounded through the waves, in a shower of liquid silver.

In rather more than an hour "The Kite" neared the point Abermenai, a mile westward of which was the miserable hamlet, destined for the reception of her cargo; and, without any obstacle to their progress, the smugglers cast anchor in the little bay, which bounded the hamlet on the side nearest the sea. Their vessel was anchored in such a situation as to enable them to land their cargo without the assistance of the boat, by forming a line from the ship to the shore. The business of unloading began, and was conducted with all possible celerity and secrecy. Tub after tub was handed to their comrades on the strand, and deposited safely in the carts which had been brought to receive them. Nothing was ever managed so skillfully, or seemed to promise so well; when, just before they had finished, the glare of a torch which had been lighted, flashed upon one of the men on the beach, and revealed to the astonished smugglers the person of a well known revenue officer! Fifty hands were clutching at his throat in an instant; and cutlasses flashed in the dubious torch-light, while some cocked their pistols to revenge upon this bold intruder the stratagem which he had thus daringly used. No sooner, however, was this anticipated discovery made, than a large posse of officers, without a dozen soldiers, rushed forward, and, rescuing the gauger, stood ready to defend the prize of which they had so cleverly possessed themselves. But the smugglers were not inclined to give it up so readily, and they, also, hastened towards the beach to regain their goods.

Cynric, whose hot blood was quickly on fire, stood foremost amongst his comrades, and was immediately recognised by some of the opposite party. The gauger, a daring fellow from Pwllheli, opened the parley. "Now, I tell you what, my fine fellows, we don't want to touch any of your lives, or harm your limbs; all we want is the tubs we have hebed you to run; and you shall have your schooner into the bargain—so take yourselves quietly off, and leave us the cargo."

"We will see you d—d first!" bawled a dark-mouthed fellow; "and if you don't give up the goods you have cheated us of, we'll pepper your jackets with a few pills that you won't like."

The gauger whispered to those who stood near him, and then addressed himself to Cynric. "We did not expect to find you in such company, Mr. Owen; but you may be of service to these men, if you will persuade them to take the terms we offer. You see our party is strong, and well prepared for the worst—and I suppose you know the penalty of resisting his majesty's officers in the execution of their duty?"

"His majesty's devils!"—shouted the former speaker, before Cynric could reply. "We don't care for his majesty, or you either; and so, my lads, let's to work, and have a whack at the gauger!" He made a rush forward as he spoke, followed by one or two of his comrades, and the next instant he fell weltering in his blood, and completely transfixed with the excise-man's cutlass. All further parley was at an end, and the conflict became general. The uproar that ensued was wild and terrible. The crowded state of the combatants—their irregular and impetuous mode of fighting, with the curses and yells, mingling with the clashing of swords, and the occasional report of fire-arms, created a scene of horror and confusion. It was some time before the soldiers could form themselves into line; but when they did so, they commenced a regular fire, which proved awfully fatal to the smugglers. Several were killed, many were wounded, while those, who could, fled to the schooner, and were allowed to escape. On the other side, two men were slain, and several wounded, but the gauger, who was a very devil in the melee, escaped unhurt. Not so, our unfortunate friend, Cynric. A musket ball passed through his arm, which, although it did not break the bone, caused him nearly to faint from pain and loss of blood. He was, of course, with many others, apprehended; and, before morning, he was safely lodged in the strongest dungeon of Caernarvon Castle, a part of which was at that time used as a county jail.

The intelligence of this adventure spread rapidly among the hills, and was conveyed—with all the marvellous additions, which it had acquired on its journey—to the knowledge of Lucy Morgan. Poor Lucy heard the account with dismay; but not with astonishment. Sad forebodings had haunted her mind, since her last interview with Cynric; and now that her suspicions were confirmed, and the dreadful result revealed, although she bore the shock better than it had been entirely unexpected, still her heart could not bear up entirely against the torrent of grief which now overwhelmed it. "I do not—I cannot hate him," she said, as she rose from old Lowry's arms. "He is Cynric—my Cynric still; and all this crime has been brought upon him by others, and not by his own heart. I am pledged to love him; and love him I will, even to—" she could not proceed, but sinking shudderingly on Lowry's bed, she sought, in a troubled slumber, a temporary alleviation of her sorrow.

Time passed on, and the summer assizes drew near. Never before or since was the great town of Caernarvon so crowded with company on such an occasion; for Cynric's situation had excited the interest of all classes. At length, the important day arrived, which was to decide Cynric's fate in this world; and he stood at the bar in a situation than which none can be more terrible. I have heard my aunt Martha say—for she, with many other ladies, was in court—that she had seldom looked upon a handsomer man than he was; although confinement and the workings of his proud spirit, had somewhat dimmed the sparkling fire of his dark eye—and cast a shade of shame and melancholy over his fine and manly features. He stood erect and firm, and pronounced, when challenged, the words "Not Guilty," in a tone which would have carried conviction to the hearts of all but a judge and jury. In less than three hours the trial was at an end; and the jury, without retiring, gave in their verdict—"Guilty!" There were many tears shed in court that day. The foreman of the jury sobbed when he pronounced the fatal word; the judge was moved when he heard it; and, in his charge to the unfortunate prisoner he wept, as my aunt said, like a tender maiden. Amongst them all the prisoner himself was unmoved—even the sentence itself, pronounced as it was with the tremendous faltering of strong agitation, caused no other emotion than a slight compression of the lips and a momentary flashing of that still sparkling eye. There was no blanching of the cheek—no hurried beating of the heart—although only one short week remained between Cynric and the scaffold.

All this time poor Lucy had been suffering severely from sickness. A violent fever, the result of all this misfortune, had kept her hovering between life and death; and she had but just begun to leave the house when Cynric's trial took place. Of its result she had no doubt; she had made up her mind to the worst; and all that she wanted was to see him once more before a violent and disgraceful death should destroy him. Her father had been with him very often; and if Cynric did entertain any hostile feeling towards his kinsman, it was now completely eradicated by that kinsman's unwearied kindness.

Pryce Morgan did not attempt to dissuade his daughter from visiting her condemned lover; and he obtained permission from the magistrates to allow their interview to be private. Cynric was apprized of the day, and even of the hour; and he waited in fearful impatience for its arrival. Lucy came—but an! how changed and wasted! Her features—“pale as monumental marble”—and appearing almost deathly from the contrast of her deep mourning—were expressive of the most withering sorrow. Her form, still, indeed, beautifully graceful, was but the shadow of its former self; and her blue eye, once the betokener of love and joy, was now dimmed and faded, and spoke only of hopes withered, and of happiness destroyed. We will not profane the sanctity of that meeting, by intruding upon its privacy. Supported by her father, Lucy entered the cell, and supported by her father she quitted it; and many a weary day passed by before a smile was seen to play again upon her melancholy and care-betokening features.

The day of execution was fast approaching, and Cynric seemed perfectly reconciled to his fate. “Hope” had long since—“withering, sighed farewell!”—and the Bangor Gazette was full of commiseration at the magnanimity and resignation of the prisoner. At an early hour on the morning of the fatal day, the gaoler, accompanied by the clergyman, who had been assiduous in his attendance on Cynric since his condemnation, repaired to his cell—but it was empty—Cynric had escaped!

MISCELLANY.

THE UNICORN.

In the physical world, some of our secrets are disappearing; and though Captain Parry failed to find out the pole, and we believe, with that worthy navigator, that the world have been dreaming from the beginning, and that there is no pole; and though Captain Ross will go further and farther, yet things are turning up now and then that our most benevolent scepticism cannot resist. But among other plunders of the imagination, they are going to rob us of the unicorn. For two thousand years and upwards, a short date in the history of human quarrel about nothings, the sages of this world have been doubting and deciding on the existence of this showy creature. Pliny would have sworn to his having all but seen it, and he would have sworn that too, if any one had taken the trouble to ask him. Kircher, and a few of the German naturalists, and black-letter fools—every naturalist and black-letter man being more or less a fool—dug up the question out of the pit of Teutonic dullness, and ever since, every traveller beyond the Needles, has had his theory, which was quite as good as his fact, and his fact, which was quite as good as his theory.

The topic perished in Germany, being stifled under Professor Bopp and Sanscrit, Professor Senler and Scepticism, Professor Jahn and Jacobinism, and the whole was feather-bed suffocation of Professor Kotzebue and Comedy. But in England it was endeared to us by associations “dear in every truly British hear,” as the chairmen of our tavern parties say over their third bottle. We had seen it for ages gallantly climbing the slippery heights of the kingly crown on show boards, carriages, transparencies, theatres, and the new, matchless hydroprick, or fiery and watery fairy palace of Vauxhall. It met us in every material from the gilt confitures of Bartholomew fair, to the gold plate of the “table laid for sixty,” at St. James’s. All the dilettanti were immersed in the great national question of its shape and features. Mr. Barrow, in a journey of exploration, which extended to three miles beyond the cape, believed that he saw it, but strongly doubted its existence. M. Vaillant never saw it, nor believed that any one ever did, but was as sure of its existence as if it had slept in his bosom, and been unto him as a daughter. Mr. Russel had one which he milked twice a day, and drove in a carriage to visit the Queen of Madagascar. Doctor Lyall is writing a quarto from Madagascar, to deny the statement in toto; admitting, however, that there is a rumour of the being of some nondescript of the kind in the mountains, somewhat between the size of the elephant and the Shetland pony; but that he and we think the subject matter will turn out asinine. But how a Mr. Ruppell, after a long sojourn in the northeast of Africa, comes at once to cheer and dishearten us by the discovery, that in Kordofan, if any one knows where that is, the unicorn exists; stated to be of the size of a small horse, of the slender make of the gazelle, and furnished with a long, straight, slender horn in the male, which was wanting in the female. According to the statements made by various persons, it inhabits the deserts to the south of Kordofan, is uncommonly fleet, and comes only occasionally to the Koldagi Heive mountains on the borders of Kordofan. This, it must be acknowledged, is a sad falling off from the rival of the lion, that we have honoured so long in the arms of England. But we sincerely hope, that by the next arrival, it will not degenerate into a cow, or worse, a goat. But he tells us, that to our knowledge of the giraffe he has added considerably. He obtained in Nubia and Kordofan five specimens, two of which were males and three females. He regards the horns as constituting the principal generic character, they being formed by distinct bones, by a very obvious suture, and having throughout the same structure with the other bones. In both sexes one of these abnormal bones is situated on each branch of the coronal suture, and the male possesses an additional one placed more anteriorly, and occupying the middle of the frontal suture. The anomalous position of this appendage furnishes a complete refutation of the theory of Camper with regard to the unicorn, that such an occurrence was contrary to nature, and proves at least the possibility of the existence of such an animal. Professor Camper is an ass, of course; but when are we to expect any thing better from the illustrious of the land of sour-kroust? Give a Doctor Magnificus his due allowance of the worst tobacco, and the worst beer in the world, with a ream of half-brown paper, and a Leipzig catalogue to plunder, and he will in three months write any subject dead—smother the plainest truth with an accumulation of absurdity, astonishing, as the work of a creature with but two hands—and prove that the earth is but a huge oyster in which Germany is the pearl; or that man is only a reclaimed baboon, of which all the wit is centered in Weimar.

ILLUSTRATION OF SOME OLD PROVERBS, &c.

“Az.” To ask. This word which now passes for a mere vulgarism, is the original Saxon form, and used by Chaucer and others. See “Tyrwhitt’s Glossary.” We find it also in Bishop Bale’s “God’s Promises.” “That their synne vengeance azed continually.” Old Plays i 19. Also in the “Four P’s,” by Heywood, “And azed them this question than.” Old Pl. i 84. An azing is used by Chaucer for a request. Ben Jonson introduces it jocularly:

“A man out of wax,
As a lady would az.”

Marques, vol. 6, p. 85.

“Between the Cup and the Lip.” The proverb that many things fall out between the cup and the lip, is a literal version of one in Latin. Multo inter pocula ac libra cadunt. The origin of which was as follows:—A king of Thrace had planted a vineyard, when one of his slaves, whom he had much oppressed in that very work, prophesied that he should never taste the wine produced in it. The monarch disregarded the prediction, and when at an entertainment he held a glassful of his own wine made from the grape of that vineyard, he sent for the slave, and asked him what he thought of his prophecy now; to which the other replied, “Many things fall out between the cup and the lip,” and he had scarcely delivered this singular response, before news was brought that a monstrous boar was laying waste the favourite vineyard. The king, in a rage, put down the cup which he held in his hand, and hurried out with his people to attack the boar; but being too eager, the boar rushed upon him and killed him, without having tasted of the wine. Such is the story related by some of the Greek writers, and though evidently apocryphal, it certainly is productive of a good practical moral.

“In the merry pin.” This is said of those who have drunk freely and are cheerful in their cups. Among the ancient northern nations, it was customary to drink out of large horns, in which were placed small pins, like a scale of distances, and he who quaffed most was considered as a toper of the first magnitude, and respected accordingly. The merry pin was that which stood pretty far from the mouth of the horn, and he who, at a draught, reduced the liquor to that point, was a man of no ordinary prowess in bacchanalian contest.

“Under the Rose be it spoken.” The rose being dedicated by Cupid to Harpocrates, the God of Silence, to engage him to conceal the amours of Venus, was an emblem of Silence; whence to present it or hold it up to any person, in discourse, served instead of an admonition, that it was time for him to hold his peace; and in entering rooms it was customary to place a rose above the table, to signify that what was there spoken should be kept private. This practice is described by the following epigram:—

Est rosa fl. Veneris cuius quo facta laterunt,
Harpocrati matri dona dicantur Amo;
Inde rogamus moniti hospes ne aperiat amicus
Convivili et sub ea dicta taceatula scilicet.

Potter’s Ant. Græcæ.

“Cant.” This word which is now generally applied to fanatical preachers, and hypocritical apprentices in religion, derives its name from two Scotch Presbyterian ministers, in the reign of Charles II. They were father and son, both called Andrew Cant; and Whitelocke in his “Memoirs,” p. 511, after narrating the defeat at Worcester, in 1651, says, “Divers Scotch ministers were permitted to meet at Edinburgh, to keep a day of humiliation, as they pretended, for their too much compliance with the King,” and in the same month, when Lord Argyll had called a parliament, Mr. Andrew Cant, a minister, said in his pulpit, that “God was bound to hold this parliament, for that all other parliaments was called by man, but this was brought about by his own hand.”

“An’t please the Pigs.” In this phrase there is not only a peculiarity of dialect, but the corruption of a word, and a change of one thing for another. In the first place, an in the midland counties, is used for if; and pigs is evidently a corruption of Pyx, the sacred vessel containing the host of Roman Catholic countries. In the last place, the vessel is substituted for the power itself, by an easy metonymy in the same manner as when we talk of “the sense of the house,” we do not mean to ascribe intelligence to a material building; but to the persons in it assembled for a deliberate purpose; the expression therefore signifies no more than “Deo volente,” or God willing.

“Bumper” In many parts of England any thing large is called a bumper. Hence a bumping lass is a large girl of her age, and a bumpkin is a large-limbed, uncivilized rustic; the idea of grossness of size entering into the idea of a country bumpkin, as well as that of unpolished rudeness. Dr. Johnson, however, strangely enough deduces the word bumpkin from bump; but what if it should prove to be a corruption of bombard, or bombard: in low Latin, bombardus, a great gun, and from thence applied to a large flagon, or full glass. Thus the Lord Chamberlain says to the porters who had been negligent in keeping out the mob,

“You are lazy knaves:
And here ye lie, bawling of bombard, when Ye should do service.”

Shakespeare, Hen. VIII, Act. 5. Scene 3.

“Baiting of bombard” is a term for sitting and drinking, which Nash in his “Supplicacyon to the Deuyll,” calls by the like metaphor, “bear baiting.” So Shakespeare again in the “Tempest” says,

“Yond same black cl ind, yond huge one,
Seems like foul bombard, that would shed his liquor.”

Temp. st, Act. 2. Scene 2.

Which Theobald rightly explains thus: “A large vessel for holding drink, as well as the piece of ordnance so called.”

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE IDIOT.

The heart, in many instances is a better judge, even of propriety of manners than the judgement. The judgement, in cases touching the conduct of individuals, is perhaps often too severe; for example, we are apt to regard with equal contempt the behaviour of the weak and the silly, without considering, that under the zero of reason there are many degrees before the human intelligence sinks to that of the animal instincts. At least it is charitable to believe so, and it cherishes amiable sentiments to inculcate that doctrine.

Every reader of dramatick history has heard of Garrick's contest with Madam Chairon, and the triumph which the English Roscius achieved over the Siddons of the French stage by his representation of the father struck with fatality on beholding his only infant child dashed to pieces by leaping in its joy from his arms. Perhaps the sole remaining conquest for histrionick tragedy is somewhere in the unexplored regions of the mind, below the ordinary understanding, amidst the gradations of idiocy. The various shades and degrees of sense and sensibility which lie there unknown, Genius, in some gifted moment, may discover. In the meantime, as a small specimen of its undivulged dramatick treasures, we submit to our readers the following little anecdote.

A poor widow, in a small town, in the north of England, kept a booth or stall of apples and sweetmeats. She had an idiot child, so utterly helpless and dependent, that he did not appear to be ever alive to danger or self-defence.

He sat all day at her feet, and seemed to be possessed of no other sentiment of the human kind than confidence in his mother's love, and a dread of the schoolboys, by whom he was often annoyed. His whole occupation, as he sat on the ground, was in swinging backwards and forwards, singing "pal-lal" in a low pathetic voice, only interrupted at intervals on the appearance of any of his tormentors, when he clung to his mother in alarm.

From morning to evening he sung his plaintive and aimless ditty; at night when his poor mother gathered up her little wares to return home, so deplorable did his defects appear, that while she carried the table on her head, her stock of little merchandise in her lap, and her stool in one hand, she was obliged to lead him by the other. Ever and anon as any of the schoolboys appeared in view, the harmless thing clung close to her, and hid his face in her bosom for protection.

A human creature, so far below the standard of humanity, was nowhere ever seen; he had not even the shallow cunning which is often found among these unfinished beings; and his simplicity could not even be measured by the standard we would apply to the capacity of a lamb. Yet it had a feeling rarely manifested even in the affectionate dog, and a knowledge never shown by any mere animal.

He was sensible of his mother's kindness and how much he owed to her care. At night, when she spread his humble pallet, though he knew not prayer, nor could comprehend the solemnities of worship, he prostrated himself at her feet, as he kissed them, numbed a kind of a mental orison, as if in fond and holy devotion. In the morning, before she went abroad to resume her station in the market place, he peeped anxiously out to reconnoitre the street, and as often as he saw any of the schoolboys in the way he held her firmly back and sang his sorrowful "pal-lal."

One day the poor woman and her Idiot boy were missed from the market-place, and the charity of some of the neighbours induced them to visit her hovel. They found her dead on her sorry couch, and the boy sitting beside her, holding her hand, swinging and singing his lay more sorrowfully than he had ever done before. He could not speak, but only utter a brutish gabble; sometimes, however, he looked as if he comprehended something of what was said. On this occasion, when the neighbours spoke to him, he looked up with the tear in his eye, and clasping the cold hand more tenderly, sung the strain of his mournful "pal-lal" in a softer and sadder key.

The spectators, deeply affected, raised him from the body, and he surrendered his hold of the earthly hand without resistance, retiring in silence to an obscure corner of the room. One of them, looking towards the others, said to them, "Poor wretch! what shall we do with him?" At that moment he resumed his chant, and lifted two handfuls of dust from the floor, sprinkled it on his head, and sung with a wild and heart-piercing pathos, "pal-lal pal-lal."

THE GATHERER.

THE LOST DRAGOON.

It is not generally known that underneath the walls of Trinity College, Dublin, there is a range of gloomy vaults in which are entombed many of the illustrious dead of the Irish capital. This cemetery has been for many years shut up; and about the time when it began to be disused, the melancholy and affecting circumstances happened which I am now going to relate. An officer of the 4th Dragoons who had enjoyed the affections of a fair Hibernian maid, and whilst every preparation was making for that consummation most devoutly to be wished for by an attached and youthful pair, chanced to be on guard at the Castle. Lounging about in his uniform, and exhibiting to the admiring eyes of many a love sick damsel his handsome person, set off with all a funeral procession passed him; and seeing that the remains of some person of consequence were about to be consigned to their parent earth in a private and unostentatious manner, curiosity prompted him to follow in the melancholy train. The procession took the direction of the College, and, passing under the archway, arrived at the entrance to the vaults. Here was seen the last of a gallant soldier. He was missed from his guard; his place at the mess-table (which he used to enliven with his hilarity and good humour) remained empty that evening. The following morning his mistress, in the figurative language of the East; "dropped the anchor of hope in a harbour of anxiety;" and conjecture was at a stand still to account for his protracted absence. Months, rolled, a year passed, still no tidings of the absentee. At last another funeral wended its way to the Trinity vaults. The mourners descended into their dark recesses. In passing along one of the sepulchral galleries, their feet crushed the mouldering bones of a skeleton. Imagine their astonishment when they observed beside it a steel casque and rusted sabre. On examining the bones, the flesh seemed to have been eaten off them by voracious rats. The sword belt and pouch were also nearly devoured, and after a great deal of speculation as to the identity of the unfortunate individual, who evidently had strayed into the vaults on a former occasion, and lost himself in their gloom, had been starved to death, and finally devoured, it was eventually found out to be the young and ill-fated dragoon.

"The pomp and panoply of glorious war,"

A TRESPASS ON TIME.

Doctor S. of Massachusetts, was a very eccentric old fellow. He had one day set out to visit a sick man who lived at some distance, and got nearly half his journey, when, in conversation with the person who had been sent for him, he chanced to inquire the age of the patient. "He is eighty years old," replied the other. "Is he so old?" rejoined the doctor; "then he has already lived ten years upon trespass, and I won't go another step." He coolly turned about his horse, and in spite of all the entreaties and remonstrances of the other, went home without seeing the patient.

EQUALIZATION.

A ragged Irish emigrant, a few years since, was arguing strongly in favour of an equal division of property in this blessed land of his adoption. "Well, suppose such a division should take place," said his opponent, "how much do you think would fall to your share?" "Why, I don't know justly," replied Teague, "but I should suppose something like two thousand dollars, more or less." "Well, what would you do with your portion when you had got?" asked the other. "Why, I'm the man that would live well on 't, wouldn't I?" rejoined the Irishman. "And when that was gone, what would you do next?" demanded the other. "What would I do next?" returned the equalizing philosopher, "why, what should I do, my jewel, but be after having another division?" [Lb.]

TRIAL OF ELIHU MATHER. The result of this trial, of which we informed our readers last week, has put to flight some of the most sanguine and longest indulged expectations of the proscriptionists. Their fruitless attempt to establish a precedent against the civil rights of members of the masonic fraternity, and their utter failure to maintain the slightest of their slanders against the character of the institution, have turned their most plausible theories topsy turvy, and brought confusion upon all their calculations. To have excluded masons from the jury, because they were mason, without any other disqualifying circumstance, would have gratified their fondest hopes—it was a measure by which they sought to, and imagined they could, under the protection of the law, cheat honest men of their rights, and by strengthening the prejudices of the people, sustain their own political fortunes; but they were disappointed—they were confounded, beaten, routed, by their own forces and with own weapons.

The trial of Mather, to his serious injury, was delayed from time to time, evidently with the view to afford his persecutors, and the enemies of masonry, an opportunity to gather together their strength,—and the systematick opposition persevered in towards such of the pannel as were masons, shows that the opportunity was improved. Seeding masons were brought forward to testify concerning certain features of masonic obligations, in the hope that they would sustain the construction put upon them by anti-masons—but they did not—their testimony, and all the testimony elicited relative to masonry, was directly favourable to it. The result proved that those who cry out against the institution for political purposes, will not maintain their assertions when under oath.

There is a report of all the important features of this trial in the Rochester Craftsman, the whole or a part of which we shall publish next week.

THEATRE. A splendid and interesting drama, called Masaniello, and founded upon the extraordinary story of the Neapolitan fisherman of that name, has been twice performed at our Theatre, the present week; and it affords us much pleasure to say, that it proved sufficiently attractive to draw goodly numbers to both pit and boxes. The scenery is rich and beautiful throughout the play, and during the last act, at the close of which is a representation of Vesuvius during an eruption, it is grand and imposing. Our readers are undoubtedly familiar with the story of Masaniello, and they will have a tolerable idea of the drama founded upon it, when we inform them that its most interesting and wonderful incidents are introduced upon the stage. The part of Masaniello was sustained very creditably by Mr. Webb, though we think there was much room for improvement, and we have too high an opinion of that gentleman's talents and ambition, to believe he will remain stationary far short of perfection. The part of Fenella (the dumb sister of Masaniello) was admirably performed by Ms. Barnes, (this lady, it is allowed, is equal, if not superior, to any actress upon the American stage; and it seems that

IMPORTANT TRIAL OF JURORS.

Reported for the Craftsman.

ORLEANS CIRCUIT, NOV. TERM, 1829.

Hon. ADDISON GARDNER, Presiding Judge.

THE PEOPLE } Indictment for Conspiracy to Kidnap William vs. } ELIHU MATHER, } Morgan.

Counsel for the People—Hon. John C. Spencer, Special Attorney, assisted by Hon. Albert H. Tracey and J. B. Cline, esq.
For the Defendant—Gen. Vincent Matthews, Col. D. D. Barnard, and W. M. Adams, esq.

William Loomis and Simon Glendon were sworn as jurors, without objection.

Jonathan French, challenged for favour, sworn and pronounced competent, the previous jurors acting as triers.

Amos Cliff, challenged, same triers, and excluded on the testimony of Jonathan French.

Jonathan Follett, challenged, same triers, sworn and pronounced competent.

Charles Kelly, challenged, same triers, sworn and pronounced competent.

Stasael Church, challenged, same triers: Seymour Murdock called as a witness—Church had said such persons as helped carry Morgan away, such as Mather and others, ought to be punished—such as drove the carriage. Jury, however, says he said the guilty should be punished; does not recollect naming Mather; probably did. Rejected.

George Hood, challenged, same triers: Elbridge Farwell called as a witness—Hood had said such men as Elihu Mather and others, who were active in the abduction of Morgan, ought to be punished. Rejected.

John Phelps, challenged for cause, rejected by the court.

Epaphras Pennell, challenged for favour, same triers. Zimari Perrigo called as witness—Pennell had said Elihu Mather was guilty, and ought to be punished. Jury sworn—had no recollection of saying that Mather was positively guilty. Had said that if the circumstances related about Mather were true, he must be guilty. He had not, however, made up a positive opinion. Rejected.

Luther St. John, challenged and sworn. He said he had formed a qualified opinion. If reports were true, he considered Mather guilty—if not, not guilty. His opinion would be governed entirely by the testimony. He had no bias or prejudice against the accused. He had heard and read much about the abduction of Morgan. Admitted.

Daniel Reid, challenged and sworn. Thinks he has expressed an opinion that Mather was concerned in the Morgan business. Rejected.

William Sherman was called, challenged, and rejected.

Wm. Ballard, challenged by Mr. Spencer, was sworn and rejected.

ROBERT ANDERSON was next drawn, and challenged on the ground that he was a member of the masonic institution. The challenge was reduced to writing, when it was demurred to by the defendant's counsel. The demurrer was sustained by the court, who overruled the principal cause of challenge. He was then challenged for favour, and the same triers appointed to decide. Jos. A. B. Brown was called as a witness on the part of the people. Witness is a royal arch mason, and knows defendant and Anderson to be such, and has met with them as companions in Gaines chapter. There are lodges, chapters and encampments; in lodges the members are called "brothers," and in chapters "companions." A mason must have belonged to a lodge before he can become a member of a chapter. The professed object of masons is CHARITY and BENEVOLENCE, and the chief of masons is first direct to those belonging to the order. Witness does not recollect one fourth of the obligations he has taken. There is a point in the royal arch obligation like this: "that the member will aid and assist a royal arch mason, and knows of no exception or qualification to this oath; and that I will aid and assist a companion royal arch mason, whenever I shall see him engaged in any difficulty, so far as to extricate him from the same, whether right or wrong." There is a "sign of distress," known to "masters," not in chapters, but a royal arch mason must have been a master. Witness was taught in the lodge to give this relief as a mason, and knows of no qualification to this obligation, if there is a probability of rendering assistance—knows of no obligation, by which one mason is bound to prefer another to himself, in case of life and death. Cross Examined—was admitted to the lodge in 1820, in Ridge way, and to the chapter in January or February 1827, at Gaines; the obligation was verbal, and administered by Dr. James Beach. A part of the obligation is, that the member "will not have his head covered or than repeat any part of the obligation then taken," which point and on; other he has repeated to persons who were not masons; the obligation commenced "in the name of Almighty God and these royal arch masons, I swear," &c.—cannot say whether there was any explanation promised to be given—none was given at the time—was requested to attend afterwards and receive instructions relative to the obligations he then took, which were four in number—once attended, and did hear explanations—the obligations were repeated, but not explained—when admitted he expected to be sworn to keep secrets. Does not recollect any obligation to obey the laws of the country, as a good citizen—cannot say there is not—there may have been—does not recollect any clause in the obligations of the four degrees conferred upon him in the chapter. His impression is, there was none.

Daniel Pratt, sworn on behalf of the people. Robert Anderson and Elihu Mather lived near neighbours together for three or four years—were good friends and on good terms, but did not visit each other more than other people—Anderson was not more intimate with Mather than with some others, and less than with some of his acquaintances. Cross Examined—Mather moved away two years ago.

Archibald L. Daniels, sworn on the same side. Lived two and a half miles from the former residence of Mather, and three and a half from that of Robert Anderson. His testimony did not vary from that of Pratt. There was not a more particular intimacy between Anderson and Mather than in some other cases. To the question, "whether from intimacy there has been in his opinion a particular attachment between these parties," to which an objection was raised by the counsel, and overruled by the court, witness answered he should judge there had been an apparent friendship—no more, however, than between Mr. Anderson and other men in the neighbourhood. Cross Examined—Elihu Mather and witness were as good friends as Mather and Anderson, and witness and Anderson were good friends.

Here the special counsel rested, and Robert Anderson was called by the defendant and sworn. There is a clause in the royal arch mason's oath, which is, without doubt, qualified similar to that stated by Doctor Brown. The obligation witness took required him, when he saw a royal arch mason in a dispute or quarrel with another person, to endeavour to get him away, by giving him a particular sign, whether he be right or wrong IN THAT QUARREL—such was the obligation as administered to witness—has heard the obligation often administered, and never without the explanation or qualification—THERE IS NO A SOLITARY SYLLABLE REQUIRING A MASON TO GIVE A VERDICT FOR A MASON AGAINST LAW AND EVIDENCE!

but on the contrary, all obligations, charges, and lectures, require him to OBEY THE LAWS—links the oath expressly require this. Witness was present when Doctor Brown became a royal arch mason, and is confident the obligation administered to him was explained and qualified as above stated. There is a feeling of friendship existing between members of churches and societies, and the same among masons; but extends no further in the last case, than the former, BUT THIS IS ALL. Witness has not been more intimate with Elihu Mather than with Pratt and other others—they were political friends—backsliders—never ate a meal in Mather's house, nor Mather in his, but once, has been a ball twice, but James Mather promised to indemnify him—has been more intimate with the two Mathers, Pratt, and Daniels than with others—they were all political friends, and this was the ground of their friendship. Cross Examined—has probably said at first that he did not believe Morgan was carried off against his will—at first thought, thought it might be possible that it was a trick between Morgan and Miller—has no opinion now that Morgan was in the carriage—has participated in the feelings of masons generally on the subject. The qualification alluded to was contained in the oath, and the qualification contains the words "dispute or quarrel"—knows there is such a qualification and thinks it is in the oath—thinks there is in the obligation a clause requiring obedience to the laws—knows that this duty is enjoined in the charges, lectures, &c. There is an obligation to support the constitution of the state chapter, but whether it is in the oath or lecture witness cannot say—thinks it regards the paying dues: there is an obligation to observe signs and summonses. Seven oaths are required to be taken to constitute a member of the chapter. Witness is a knight templar—Mather is not. The qualification is given at the same time with the oath, if it is not in it. Witness is now of opinion that Morgan was carried off: the opinion that Mather did not know that Morgan was in the carriage was formed very early, at the time he was a candidate for the assembly, thinks all the evidence leaves the matter doubtful. If Morgan was in the carriage, thinks Mather must have known it. Witness has made up no opinion so as not to give testimony its true weight, and thinks the guilty should be punished. Witness is so much objected to that he should not feel right to be on the jury—does not think that he has any bias which would lead him from the testimony or law—has formed no particular opinion whether Morgan was in the carriage or not, does not know that he has expressed an opinion that Mather knew Morgan was in the carriage.

Isaac W. Averill, called on behalf of the people. Is not a member of the society of freemasons, but has been—was a member of Gaines chapter—the obligation he took was "Whenever I should see a companion royal arch mason engaged in any quarrel or difficulty, that I would fly to his relief, and extricate him from the same, if in my power, whether right or wrong"—the obligation, as to obeying a sign or summons, in substance, is, "If a sign of distress, or summons, be given, sent or thrown, he should render assistance"—has but a faint idea of it, however. Cross Examined—The explanation or qualification is always given as soon as the oath is ended, and as to assistance, it is given to the witness, thus: "If I should see a royal arch mason engaged with any other person, in the street or elsewhere, or in any quarrel against the peace of the state, that I should immediately go to him and get him away from that particular place, not inquiring whether he was right or wrong." This is always given at the time of administering the obligation—has heard it often. The explanation or obeying a summons is this: When a royal arch mason is sick, or in a case of fire, and gives a sign or summons, it is the duty of the initiated to assist if he can, without injury to himself or family—the explanation is always given in the course of taking the degree. The first charge given always is that a mason should be a GOOD AND LOYAL SUBJECT—no duty is enjoined to protect treasurers from the law—no obligation to preserve each other's secrets on all subjects and on all occasions, any further than those of the lodge.

Milton H. Hopkins, sworn on behalf of the people. Has been a freemason. One obligation is, "I furthermore promise and swear that I will obey all regular signs and summonses given, handed, sent, or thrown from a brother mason, or a regular constituted lodge of the same." There is no qualification to this. Another is, "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will fly to the relief of a brother master mason, whenever I see the grand hallinger of distress, or hear the words appended thereto, if there is a greater probability of saving his life than of losing my own." Another is, "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will aid and assist any needy brother master mason, finding him worthy, their widows and orphans, wherever dispersed around the globe, so far as their wants may require, and my circumstances will admit, without injury to myself or family." A fourth is, "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will apprise a brother of all approaching danger, so far as lies in my power." There is no qualification to the first, second, or fourth clause—none of them are explained at the time they are administered to any mason, but at the time-clerks are given which would seem to contradict the tenor of the oath—had this impression when he took the degree, but now sees that he was blinded by the charge to the real purpose of the oath. Witness has not gone beyond the master's degree; the obligations are uniform, and there is a sign of distress given by motion or words. Cross Examined—is a succeeding mason—renounced masonry three or four years since, and has not met with a lodge since 1826—was made a mason in Jefferson county, in 1817, and was soon after elevated to the master's degree—has looked at books on this subject, but could repeat the obligations when the first book was published. His eyes were blinded when the oath was taken, but were not when the charge was given. The charge relates to his duty as a mason, and instructs him to be charitable and a good citizen; it inculcates justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude; one of the obligations witness has taken upon himself is, "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will keep a brother master mason's secrets, knowing him to be such, when delivered to me in charge, and that they shall remain a secret and inviolable in my breast as his own: murder and treason excepted, and that at my own election." Has heard this obligation administered in the town (Barre, Orleans county) Witness considered the oath the most solemn thing he ever took upon himself; but has since discovered the charge blinded him to the nature of the oath; discovered this long ago before the charge; the candidate is told that his oath is not to interfere with the religion or politics; the first charge is to be a good and loyal citizen, and the candidate is enjoined to support the laws. The charges are lightly and improperly. Witness has repeated these things often; the name of the Supreme Being is used in the oaths; masons are required to keep secrets; the charges are short.

Green Nickelson, called on the part of the people. Witness was made a mason in Gaines lodge—recalls the obligations, which are substantially the same as represented by the last witness; they differ a little in words but their import is the same. The charges are more injunctive, without referring to the oaths. Cross Examined—the charges made more impression than the oaths, and explained his duty as a mason. He was charged to be a good citizen, and obey the law; had no other impression at the time, and did not think himself under any obligation to protect or commit crime. When he examined the matter afterwards, he thought differently, and that by the literal reading of the oath he was bound to commit crime: and found nothing in the charges which would exonerate him from that obligation.

The case was ably summed up by the different counsel; the judge charged the triers, who returned as their verdict, that the juror was not indifferent, and ROBERT ANDERSON was consequently REJECTED.

The name of Stephen Martin, jr. was next drawn from the jury box, and was challenged for cause.

Elbridge Farwell, sworn as a witness. Juror had said he believed the carriage carried Morgan, that Mather drove it, knew Morgan was in it, and was guilty.

The juror was sworn as a witness. [An offer was made to prove that his opinion was made up in a way, which would, if offered, before triers, show that the juror ought not to be excluded. To this the defendant's counsel objected, and called for the opinion of the court, on the facts proved by them, unless the special counsel offered to prove facts contradictory to those sworn to by the preceding witness. This was overruled, and the judge decided that the witness should go on, in order to determine if his testimony would reduce this challenge from one for cause to one for favour, and if thus reduced, it should be tried by triers.] Witness says he has now no settled opinion in any other way than from history and common reports, in no case obtained from the witnesses. If the circumstances should be done away by evidence, then his belief would be changed; he should not consider the defendant guilty. If the circumstances should not be proved as reported, it would reverse his belief. Juror rejected.

Jos. Baker, was challenged for cause, sworn and rejected.

JOHN DOLLY was challenged by the counsel for the people, and ordered to stand aside for the present.

Moses Bacon, challenged for cause, was sworn, and said he was afraid Mather was guilty—rejected.

JOSHUA RAYMOND was challenged by the counsel for the people. Eliah Wright called as a witness. Heard Raymond say that he believed Morgan was gone off, and was now absent by his own consent. Cross Examined—Should think the declaration in earnest; it was made this morning; cannot say who commenced the conversation, several persons were present.

Hiram Sickles, sworn. Says Raymond declared himself as related by the preceding witness, some time ago.

Alexis Ward, sworn. Says Raymond said he did not think Morgan was carried off against his will, and was peddling his book. [Here counsel for the people asked the court on his evidence to decide against the juror, the challenge being that he had expressed an opinion, but was overruled.]

The juror was called by counsel for defendant. Has never formed an opinion of the guilt or innocence of Mather. This morning, when blackguarded, he said they, the masons, had not carried off any body yet against his will; has stated this often when run upon. Sometimes done so because he thought those who questioned him meant to be rude; has not declared this to the above witnesses, as his real opinion. Rejected.

JOHN FREEMAN, challenged for cause. The court decided against the challenger, and the juror was then challenged for favour. Jury examined, says he has a belief that Mather was engaged in carrying off Morgan—has had it long. Cross Examined—if this belief were not proved correct on the trial he should give it up—but now believes from all he has heard, that Mather drove the carriage and is guilty. The case was argued before triers, and the juror rejected.

JOHN DOLLY called again, and challenged for cause, the first challenge being withdrawn. Juror sworn. Says he has not formed an opinion. Expressed an opinion a week ago; was asked by Dyer Sprague whether Mather ought to be punished, and answered immediately that he ought not. Cross Examined.—Did not make this expression on purpose to get off the jury, but thought of it at the time, believing that Sprague's object was to get him to disqualify himself as a juror; was about to give a reason for his expression to Sprague, but saw he was in liquor and went off; meant to be understood that he had not formed any decided opinion, whether defendant ought to be punished, although he had expressed one; considered Mather innocent until proved guilty. The challenge was overruled, and the juror was again challenged for favour, and the challenge sustained, notwithstanding the objection raised by the defendant's counsel, that it had once been withdrawn. Ern H. Beach and Silas P. Halsey were agreed on and sworn as triers.

Harvey Chubb, sworn on the part of the people; knows John Dolly.

Joseph R. Brown, sworn on the part of the people. Knows John Dolly, and thinks he is a mason, but cannot say he is higher than a master mason. Cross Examined.—Knows it in no other way than sitting in a lodge with him. If Dolly were not a mason, he could not have got into the lodge, without deceiving the Tyler. A committee is usually appointed to ascertain by signs and tokens whether a visitor be a mason, or not; thinks Morgan's book, from reading nearly half, generally correct, and contains signs and tokens. A man acquainted with the book might have got into a lodge five years ago; thinks he saw Jachin and Boaz, a book professing to contain a mode of making masons.

Juror sworn for the people. Is a freemason, and has taken eight or nine degrees; is a royal arch companion, and has met with the defendant in the chapter as a member. Did not see him made a mason, and knows not where he was initiated. Witness has lived in the vicinity twelve years; the lodge at Gaines was organized soon after he settled here; witness was then a royal arch mason. He knew the defendant in the chapter soon after it was organized.

Dr. Brown called again. According to his own knowledge and experience it is necessary in order to be made a mason that a person should take upon himself a solemn obligation or oath. Witness received four degrees at Gaines, the last of which was that of a Royal Arch Mason. The obligation he took as to assisting a brother, he narrated as before and knows of no qualification to this part of the obligation; this and every distinct part or point of the obligation begins with, "I furthermore promise and swear." No explanation of the oath was given, at the time it was administered to him. The three first degrees are, "entered apprentice," "fellow craft," and "master mason," and are under the jurisdiction of a lodge, there are four degrees, conferred in the chapter, viz. "mark master," "past master," "most excellent master," and "royal arch"—these four together form the chapter, and to each of these degrees there is a separate obligation, and separate signs and tokens of recognition. Witness never sat in any other chapter than that at Gaines, and has been in the four lodges in the county of Orleans; he has met persons residing out of the county who made themselves known to him as masons—not by tokens or signs—they were strangers who visited and sat in the same lodge with himself; again, others have made themselves known to him as royal arch masons, by one of them asking a question, and the other answering it—the words by which these masons made themselves known to him were the same as were taught him in the chapter at Gaines, for the purpose of making himself known to other royal arch masons whenever he met them; he, by reason of their addressing him in the words referred to, did look upon them as royal arch masons, and did receive and converse with them as such. The direct question—"have you made yourself known to others by the same words as a royal arch mason, and been received and treated by them as such?" was objected to, but the objection being overruled by the court, the witness answered it in the affirmative; and says further, that if the question, as asked in the chapter, should be asked Dolly, supposes Dolly could not answer it without his being a royal arch companion, and if he did answer it correctly, it would entitle them to receive each other as members of Gaines Chapter; if they were not so as to communicate by words, there are signs which would enable him to recognize him as a companion—others might make accidentally the same signs—there are signs by which one mason below the degree of a companion can inform another that he is in distress. Cross Examined.—The royal arch obligation is administered to three at a time; Sheriff Benton and Mr. Whitney were sworn with himself; he was told at the time he should receive instructions and explanations afterwards; in all the previous degrees, that the charges, explanation, address, counsel, or advice, accompanied each degree, explaining the duty of a mason in that degree; and the reason why the several ceremonies were gone through with in that particular manner; in the outset it is enjoined as a duty to obey and respect the laws—the use of the sign of distress was explained to mean that in case of real distress the sign might be given, and relief obtained or afforded; witness was instructed never to give it except in cases of real distress, or when his life was in imminent danger, unless he was in the body of a lodge, or in some by and secure place, for the benefit of the craft—this is a part of the obligation itself; in the charge is a reference to this point in the obligation by which the candidate is solemnly enjoined not to use the sign of distress on any other occasion; for the first degree there is a charge laid down in a book, which is always read when the first degree is conferred, requiring the candidate to obey the laws, and walk upright before all men and masons; in the master's degree prayers are used and the scripture read, and also in the royal arch degree. All lodges are opened and closed with prayers. Witness knows nothing in masonry in words requiring any disobedience, or assistance to the laws, or the protection of crime—no such thing was imposed upon him, as he understood it; never heard the royal arch mason's obligation but once; does not recollect the word "quarrel"; only states it from recollection; has had acquaintance only with two royal arch masons out of his own chapter. In the master's obligation there is a clause that runs thus: "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will support the constitution of the Grand Lodge of the State of New York; and I furthermore promise and swear, that I will obey the by-laws, rules and regulations of this lodge, or of any other lodge of which I may become a member"; thinks the same clause is in the royal arch mason's obligation; never conceived any obligation imposed on him to commit crime, and does not now; now thinks the obligations may lead to the commission or protection of crime. Cross Examined.—Whether the obligations would produce mischief or not depended upon construction and interpretation—he did not understand them to countenance crime.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

NEW-YORK.

At an annual meeting of the members of Ark Lodge, No. 271, in Coeymans, December 7, 1829; the following brethren were elected for the ensuing year:—

Seth Hawley, Master; W. V. B. HISTORICAL.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

Morelos had anticipated that the formation of a congress would, by forming a point of union, have ensured concert among the insurgents scattered over remote parts of the country. And he was right, if the congress could have maintained its authority. After its escape from Iturbide, it was safely conducted by General Bravo to Tehuacan, where Teran had his head-quarters; disputes between its members, however, so soon began, that that officer dissolved it so early as the 15th of December, seven days before Morelos' death. Each of the insurgent chiefs now acted independently, so that the Viceroy was enabled to crush them successively; and availing himself of these successes, wisely proclaimed an amnesty, which was joyfully accepted by many. Teran, after a series of brilliant operations, was obliged to avail himself of this lenity. Rayon was made prisoner as well as Bravo. Victoria retired to the mountains, and lived without intercourse with human society for eighteen months; and, we believe, Guerrero alone maintained a small but respectable force among the fastnesses of the south.

The affairs of the revolution was thus languishing, when the gallant Mina landed, on the 15th of April, 1817, with a small but determined band of foreigners to aid the cause of independence. The moment was a most unpropitious one, for the only co-operation on which this young hero could calculate was that of a few predatory bands that ravaged the country, under chiefs of the degraded character of Padre Torres, of whose infamy and atrocities Robinson has given a lively portrait in his account of this ill-fated expedition. In addition to this, Mina was a Spaniard, and the Creoles doubted his sincerity in establishing that independence to which all of them still fondly clung.

Mina landed with only 359 men and officers, of whom 50 under the command of Colonel Perry abandoned him shortly afterwards. One hundred were left to garrison a small fort at Soto de la Marina, under the orders of Major Sarda, while the enterprising chief himself determined to make the attempt to traverse the continent, in order to effect a junction with one or other of the insurgent corps in the very centre of Mexico. On his march he first defeated 400 cavalry, and afterwards a force of 980 European infantry and 1100 Creole cavalry. His whole force in this last action amounted only to 173 men, yet the route of the royalists was so complete, that the cavalry were not heard of for four days. Marching on, he effected, on the 22d of June, a junction with an irregular corps. Another victory crowned his valour; but it was unfortunate that he seized the property of the Marquis Jaral, and that his depot at Soto de la Marina was carried by assault. The tide of fortune now turned, failure followed close upon failure, and his followers were reduced, chiefly by death, to fifty. With this little corps he attempted to assault Guanajuata at night, was unsuccessful, and having been surprised at a hacienda, in which he had sought refuge, was taken prisoner, and after the most brutal treatment from Orrantia, the Spanish commandant, was shot in July, 1817, in his twenty-eighth year. All the other insurgent chiefs were either destroyed or pardoned by July, 1819, except Guerrero, whom we have already mentioned; so that there was the most confident hope among the royalists that the legitimate government, as they deemed it, would be re-established. But this confidence showed that the Viceroy Apodaca and his friends were much less conversant with the subject than his predecessor the Conde de Calderon, who appears to have watched the progress of revolutionary principles with infinite acuteness, and to have traced with rare dexterity the secret springs of action that had produced the successive convulsions he had unavailingly essayed to counteract. Apodaca was not, however altogether wrong; there certainly was a strong prestige in favour of the mother country, and had that been dexterously turned to account, it is impossible to say how far the projects of the revolutionists might not have been counteracted, possibly with benefit to Mexico.

We have already seen that by the middle of 1819 the insurgent cause was reduced to its lowest ebb. Shortly after this period, the decrees of the Cortes arrived respecting the sale of church property. Apodaca, it is said, wished to avert their execution; but having received imperative orders, he was obliged to enforce them. Mr. Ward states, that being desirous of effecting the counter revolution, he employed Iturbide to show that by upholding the king in opposition to the constitution, religion and all that was valuable would be secured. We have always understood, however, that it was with the utmost reluctance Apodaca executed the orders, judging very correctly that at the first moment of pacification it was most imprudent to excite the hostility of the clergy; but having no alternative, he obeyed his instructions. To destroy the elements of insurrection, he also determined on crushing its last resource in Guerrero; and, we believe, that it was for this object, and not for that of overturning the constitution, that Don Augustin Iturbide was sent by the Viceroy. Be that as it may, Iturbide, probably seeing the road to distinction open, did not attack Guerrero; but, as we have understood, employed himself with the Curate of Iguala in drawing up the celebrated Plan of Iguala; after which, uniting himself with Guerrero, he proclaimed, on the 24th of February, 1821, the independence of his country. This declaration, however, was by no means received, at first, with the enthusiasm that might have been anticipated. Apodaca was deposed by the dominant party in Mexico, and Novella, an officer of artillery, succeeded to him, but his authority was not generally recognised. In the further progress of Iturbide and his army, the movements in their support are described as almost simultaneous; so that by the month of July the whole country (with the exception of the capital) had embraced his cause. In this career of success he had reached Queretaro, on his way to the capital, when the intelligence of the arrival of the constitutional Viceroy, Don Juan O'Donju, at Vera Cruz, diverted his progress to Cordova, whither the latter was permitted to proceed, and there the two chiefs, on the 24th of August, 1821, concluded the treaty of Cordova, founded on the Plan of Iguala; by which it was agreed that the evacuation of the Mexican territory by the Spanish army should take place, and all the other arrangements in the Plan of Iguala should be carried into full effect. As the objects proclaimed were the independence of New Spain as a separate monarchy, the maintenance of the Catholic religion, and the union of all classes, the army, which was to uphold them, was denominated the "Army of the three Guarantees," and to it the capital was surrendered on the 27th September, 1821, the Viceroy (Novella) and his troops being sent to Havana at the cost of Mexico. O'Donoghue was associated with Iturbide and others in the actual government, which was to await the decision of that of Spain. It was also determined to appoint a congress to fix the principles of the constitution. At this point the labours of Senor Bustamante and his epitomizer terminate.

The Congress met on the 24th of February, 1822, and the discordant elements of which it was composed soon developed themselves. The strict adherence to the Plan of Iguala, who wished, in conformity to it, to have a constitutional monarchy, with a Bourbon prince at its head, were called "Borbonistas." The republican party struggled for a republic, though of what kind was undefined; while a third party arose, who desired to adhere to the Plan of Iguala in all things except the selection of the monarch, whom they wished to be Iturbide; these were termed "Iturbidistas." Previously, however, to the meeting of the Mexican Congress (on the 13th of February) the Spanish Cortes had decreed that the groundwork of all these proceedings was null and void—which annihilated the first of the parties enumerated, and left the contest between the two last. Violent disputes having arisen between the legislative and executive bodies, on the subject of money and of a standing army, intrigues were set on foot by the adherents of Iturbide, and he was proclaimed Emperor on the 19th of May, 1822, by the non-commissioned officers of the garrison of the capital, under the title of Agustin the First. This tumultuary election was sanctioned by the Congress, and confirmed by the provinces without opposition. Fresh struggles with the legislature for greater powers followed, which were abruptly terminated by the dissolution of that body by a military force. A junta of forty-five persons were formed by the Emperor out of his most compliant followers. Forced loans, and other vexations, excited a fresh insurrection, which, though repressed in the north under Garza, blazed with great fury in Vera Cruz, which, under Santana, the Governor, had declared in decided opposition to the existing government.

Echavari, a Spaniard, high in Iturbide's confidence, was sent with a considerable force to repress this revolutionary ebullition; but that officer finding that Guadalupe Victoria had joined Santana, and that defection was general, with an apostacy too common in Mexican annals, declared, with his whole army, against the Emperor, and signed the Convention of Casa Mata. The revolt spread rapidly, and finding himself deserted by those who had most largely benefited by his elevation, on the 8th of March, 1823, the latter assembled the original Congress and tendered his abdication. This was not accepted; but he was permitted to quit the country with his family, with an annual pension of 25,000 dollars. He was escorted to the coast by General Bravo, who had been one of his most determined opponents, but was selected by the fallen chief, no doubt from a recollection of the high-minded principles of that genuine patriot and gallant man. As soon as Iturbide had abandoned the reins of government, a new executive was formed with the title of "Poder Ejecutivo," consisting of Victoria, Bravo, and Negrete, whose three deputies, or "suplentes," were Guerrero, Michelena, and Dominguez. The republican government being thus established, a constitution was proclaimed, the different states enacted their local laws and confederated for general objects, and such was the apparent progress to a regular form of government, that in October, 1823, the British government was induced to send out agents to Mexico, as well as to all the newly declared independent states. The recognition of their independence, and treaties with each of them, were the consequence. It has, of late, been the fashion with a certain class of politicians to decry these measures, merely because they have thought fit to regard them as the individual acts of Mr. Canning. The opinion of the inexpediency of maintaining political relations with the new states is founded in ignorance of the subject, and the assertion that they owe their entire existence to the late illustrious premier marks a total disregard of passing events. The attention of the British government had been long and loudly called to the subject by capitalists, who had prior to our sending out missions, embarked large sums in commercial and mining speculations in the new states. The measure had been some time determined on, and Mr. Canning only selected the moment of adoption as well as the method of execution. Whoever investigates these points (which have now become matter of history) will find that in all respects the greatest judgment was displayed, and that our ministers were fully justified in his manly exultation at "having called the Americas into existence." We cannot enter into the narrow views of those who blame the measure solely because many speculators have been ruined. The fault is their own, not that of the government. Though advantages (if any existed) were secured to them, there was no obligation to risk any thing.

WET FEET.

What a crowd of painful recollections are conjured up in the mind of a physician, of any age and experience, by the words wet feet. The child which had been playing about in the morning in all its infantile loveliness and vivacity, is seized at night with croup from wet feet, and in a day or two is a corpse. The youthful form of female beauty, which a few months before gladdened the eyes of every beholder, is now wasting in slow, remediless decay. What was the origin of her malady? Wet feet. Let us hope that the exposure was incurred in a visit of mercy to a helpless widow or distressed orphan. Whence come the lingering disease, the pain and suffering of that fond mother? Still the same response getting her feet wet, while providing suitable winter's clothing for her children—as if tenderness for her offspring justified her dispensing with all the rules of prudence for herself. Thus we might continue the melancholy list of diseases, at best harassing and alarming, often fatal, to which the heedlessness of youth, the pride of manhood, or the avarice of old age, are voluntarily and causelessly exposed by a neglect of one lesson of every day-experience.

It needs no medical lore or laboured reasoning to show the great influence which impressions on the feet exert over the rest of the body at large. The real martyrdom produced by tickling them, and the cruel punishment of the bastinado, are sensible evidences of their exquisite delicacy of feeling. Of this fact we have more pleasurable experience in the glow diffused through the whole system, when, chilled and shivering, we hold them for a while to the fire, or when, during the prevalence of the dog star we immerse them in cold water to allay the heat which is then coursing through our veins. Are the internal organs of the body a prey to wasting inflammation, as in the hectic fever of consumption, there is a sensation of burning heat in the feet. Is the body feeble and the stomach unable to perform its digestive functions, these parts are habitually cold. In both health and disease there is a constant sympathy between the feet and the different organs of the body. Whatever be the weak part, it suffers with unfailing certainty from the impressions of cold and moisture on the feet. No matter whether the tendency be to sick-headach, or sore throat, hoarseness and cough—pain of the stomach, or rheumatism, or gout, severally and all they will be brought on by getting the feet wet, or at times even by these parts being long chilled, from standing on cold ground or pavement. And who, it might be asked, are the chief victims to such exposures? Not the traveller caught in the storm, or the man of business, or even the day-labourer, who cannot always watch the appearance of the clouds and pick their steps with an especial avoidance of a muddy soil, or wet streets—O no!—we must look for the largest number of sufferers among the rich, the fair, and the lovely of the land—those who need only walk abroad when invited by the fair blue sky and shining sun,—or who, if pleasure calls at other seasons, have all the means of protection against the elemental changes, which wealth can command of ingenuity and labour. They it is who neglect suitable protection for their feet, and brave the snow and rain with such a frail covering as would make the strong man tremble for his own health, were he to be equally daring.

At a season like the present it would seem to be a matter of gratulation, that shoes and boots can everywhere be obtained of such materials as to preserve the feet dry and warm. Leather of various kinds, firm, or pliable and soft, is at the shortest warning made to assume every variety of shape and figure, called for by convenience or fashion. But we mistake,—fashion, that despotick destroyer of comfort, and too often a sworn foe to health, will not allow the feet of a lady fair to be incased in eather. She must wear, forsooth, cloth shoes with a thin leather sole, and even this latter is barely conceded. A covering for the feet never originally intended to be seen beyond the chamber or the parlour, is that now adopted for street parade and travel; and they whose cheeks we would not that the winds of heaven should visit too roughly, brave in prunello the extremes of cold and moisture, and offer themselves as willing victims to all the sufferings of the shivering ague, catarrh, and pains rheumatick. Tell them of a wiser course; argue with some on their duties, as mothers and as wives, to preserve their health—with others as daughters of beauty who are risking by approaching disease the loss of their loveliness, and they will reply, that they cannot wear those horrid large shoes—that leather does not fit so nicely on the feet, and that India rubber shoes are frightful. They do not reflect that beauty consists in the fitness and harmony of things, and that we cannot associate it with the ideas of suffering and disease.

TEN YEARS.

We are astonished when we contemplate the changes which have been effected in the course of ten years! How rapidly the sweeping tide of time rolls on! The morning of life passes off like a dream, and we look round in vain for the companions of our youthful days. Where are the gay, the beautiful, the happy, with whom we sported in the sprightliness of youth and the buoyancy of enjoyment? They were here; we knew them; we loved them; we sailed with them down time's sunny stream in pleasure's fragile bark—but where are they now? Alas! they have gone before us—the whirlwind of death drove them rapidly onward, and they are now sailing on eternity's wide and shoreless sea! The scenes of our childhood, too, fade away, and soon not a vestige of them is left as a token that they have ever existed! Time's stupendous wheel is ever rolling on. Ten years more, and where will we be? Our present friends, our present companions, will they still be here? No, that is impossible. The grave, perhaps, will have swallowed them; or they may be scattered far away—strangers, and in a strange land. Ten years, and the aspect of things to many, very many, will be indeed changed. The pale emaciated miser, that now bends over his heaps of useless gold, (the wrecks of ruined families and the last remains of forlorn wretchedness) where will he be? He and the beggar, whom he drives from his door, will have gone to their long homes—his wealth have passed into other hands. Ten years, and the student that is now pouring over volumes and seeking with such avidity for knowledge, will have acquired and perhaps have forgotten it. The lovely maiden, whose mind and person are just matured—she is beautiful, she is happy,—pleasure beams in her countenance and joy sparkles in her eye—with a light foot and lighter heart, she steps upon life's slippery stage—but alas! ten years, and this lovely being will indeed, be changed; the bright fascinating smile no longer plays upon her cheek; her laughing eye speaks deeper misery now than ever it did of pleasure.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

THE BETROTHED.

Never was criminal's salvation more rejoiced at than this. Even the gaoler himself, although subjected to reprehension for his negligence, was not sorry; and the people who had come from the most distant parts of the adjacent country to witness, in those parts, the rare exhibition of hanging, departed to their homes, rejoicing at the cause of their disappointment. But how did he escape? This was now the material for gossip and wonderment. As far as conjecture went, it seemed that some of Cynric's late confederates had contributed very considerably to his liberation; for many people now remembered to have seen a strange vessel in the offing for two or three days previous to Cynric's disappearance. Now the cell which he occupied was in that part of the castle which abuts upon the sea. It had a window well barred, it is true, and at a fearful height above the water; but what were these, when opposed to the daring exploits of his late confederates? At all events, he was gone—and gone nobody knew where. And poor Lucy, while she was grateful for his liberation from a disgraceful death, could not but hope that he might at some distant time return, and claim her as his dear betrothed wife.

It was towards the close of the festival of All Saints' eve, not many years ago, that two horsemen found themselves on the summit of a rugged pass in Merionethshire, known by the name of the Pass of the Frozen Portal. They were on their way to Dolgelley, the rude capital of the wild county just mentioned. Military men they both appeared to be; and one, who rode somewhat in advance, though not sufficiently so to be beyond the sound of the other's voice, was evidently of a superior rank to his companion. In conversation neither of them seemed inclined to indulge; and so they rode on in silence, with the exception of an occasional question from the officer, who did not seem to be so well acquainted with the locale as his attendant. Traversing this rude and desolate district, they gained at length its western termination, but not before they observed some dark and rugged clouds rising from the west, and spreading swiftly over the sky. Descending into the valley, and the scenery became so beautiful, that, notwithstanding the indication of the coming tempest, they could not refrain from occasionally lingering to gaze upon some grand or lovely spot, as it burst on their sight. The descent from the pass I have mentioned into the vale of the Gwynion is very gradual: and long after our travellers had left the barren rocks of the defile they still continued to traverse very high ground. Few scenes, even in Wales, can compete with that which was now exposed to the view of the horsemen. Beneath them was spread a vale richly cultivated, and copiously embellished with wood, water, rich pastures, and smiling habitations. Its boundaries on each side were lofty hills, stretching from east to west, and terminating in another mountainous range, spreading out into apparent infinity. High above all, on the south, towered Cader Idris, the monarch mountain of Merionethshire, and second to none in Wales, the mighty and mist-clad Snowdon alone excepted; and now, reposing in the soft gloom of an autumnal evening, it appeared some huge petrified monster congealed on the surface of a mountainous ocean. Far, far in the west gleamed the blue surface of the river Maw, or Mowddach; and in the very heart of the valley was the little town of Dolgelley, surrounded by a shadowy mantle of smoke,—the abode, apparently, of tranquillity, and happiness, and love.

But the clouds were gathering faster and faster; and as the wind began to moan amongst the trees, our travellers thought it best to urge on their horses, as they were not very desirous to be overtaken by a storm in a situation so bleak and distant. The rain had already begun to fall ere they reached a small alehouse, at the junction of two roads, known by the name of the Cross Foxes. The house was sufficiently mean and uninviting; but glad to escape the "pelting of the pitiless storm" —and in those upland districts storms are, indeed, "pitiless"—they readily alighted; and while the colonel stumbled into the house, his attendant took charge of his horse, and saw it, as well as his own, safely deposited in a shed at one end of the building.

The colonel's appearance caused no trifling consternation to a group of merry rusticks, who were "keeping" with great spirit the festival which they had met to celebrate. The sudden apparition of a stranger—probably an Englishman, and certainly one of a rank far superior to their own—"startled" them from "their propriety;" and the loud laugh of jocund mirth, which the colonel heard as he pushed open the door, was changed into an indistinct and hushed muttering, in a language not more musical than that of the Cherokee Indians. "Do not let me disturb your mirth, my honest fellows," said the colonel, as he witnessed the confusion which has unexpected appearance created, "I come but to shelter myself from the shower that is falling." The company, among which were two or three rosy cheeked lasses, stared still more, when one of the girls said, "Dym Saesong, sir." "Here, Evan," said the colonel to his servant, who had just then entered, "you can talk Welsh;—I will leave you to explain matters to these good people, and to quiet their fears of being devoured by an English stranger. Tell the landlord to give them as much ale as they can drink." Evan in a very short time was, with true soldier-like freedom, flirting furiously with the girls, and drinking the colonel's health with a hearty gusto with the men.

The colonel had seated himself on the old high-backed settle by the fire, where, wrapped up in his cloak, he remained apparently inattentive to what was passing around him. He was roused, however, from his reverie, by the following conversation, every word of which he understood, although carried on in Welsh. As our readers, many of them at least, may not be so learned, we shall endeavour to translate it into English.

"And so it was more than fifteen years ago, was it," said Evan, "since the affair happened? And what became of the young devil, Cynric Owen?"

"He went off to 'Merica after he broke prison, and no one ever heard of him after; and for the gang, that was soon knocked up after this business."

"Is the family still at Garthmeilath?"

"Miss Lucy is, but the old gentleman is dead these four years and more. I was a shearer there this season; and though Miss Lucy is a nice good lady, I don't much like him as is to marry her."

"To do what?" exclaimed the colonel, starting from his seat; "to marry her?"

"Yes, indeed truth," answered the man in very intelligible English, but startled somewhat at the suddenness of the colonel's interruption, "Peoples was say so; and isn't he living close by, and has been this long time. But he must make haste, if he means to have her, for the doctor says she never will get well."

"Is she ill then?" asked the colonel, in a voice so low and mournful as to make an impression even upon the rough hearts of his companions.

"Is indeed, and has been this long time," answered one of the girls; "and it's all about that false-hearted, wicked wretch, wild Cynric as they called him. I wish he may be hanged, that I do, —the good-for-nothing cruel fellow!"

The colonel hid his face more completely in his cloak, and sinking down upon the settle, seemed greatly agitated by the intelligence which he had just heard. "Bring me some brandy!" he shouted to the landlord; after a pause, "and be quick about it."

The landlord brought a tumbler half full, and was going to fill it with water, when his guest snatched the glass from his hand, and drank up the raw spirit at one gulp. Starting up, he exclaimed, "Now, Evan, bring out the horses!"

Evan looked imploringly at his master—for the rain was beating smartly against the casement—"It rains hard, your honour; and—"

"Hold your tongue, sirrah! and do my bidding! Quick! Begone!" And Evan went,—for he well knew that it was useless to reason with his master: and, however deeply he regretted leaving such comfortable quarters, and such merry companions, there was no alternative: and so the horses were quickly at the door.

"You have had a good skinfull of all, Evan," said the colonel, as he mounted his horse, "and our horses are not at all blown. Now, drive your spurs into Captain's sides, and follow me: we have some rough ground to go over, and a good hour's sharp riding—it will be hard work, I promise you."

Evan merely uttered his readiness to obey; and striking their spurs up to their rowels in the horses, away they rode through the rain, as though they were on a matter of life and death.

Evan could not conceive what whim his master had now got into his head. Fittful, and strange, and impetuous he will know him to be: but he generally had some cause for his oddities: but here there was none—none, that is, which he knew of. Sorely puzzled, therefore, was Evan to account for this sudden freak; nor was his curiosity diminished, when, on arriving, at Dolgelley, instead of tarrying for the night, as Evan fully expected, at the Golden Lion, he galloped across that quiet little town, and rode on towards the mountains which bound the county on the south-west. "The devil is in my master now, to a certainty," thought Evan, "to go along through the pelting rain at this rate! and the night coming on too! Well, with all his whimsies, he is a good kind master; and I'll follow him to the world's end—even such a night as this—if he likes."

They rode on swiftly and in silence, till they came to an old mill by the brink of a brawling river, whose waters, flooded by the rain which had fallen, rushed in foam and fretfulness over its rocky and uneven bed. The colonel reined in his panting horse. "You will stop here, Evan," he said, hurriedly, "till I send for you. Morgan Davies will you give a lodging?"

"Shan't I go with you sir?" asked Evan.

"No—you shall see me again soon, or hear from me." And again did the colonel strike the spurs into the horse, till he swiftly sped up an activity in the road, and was out of sight in an instant.

The colonel followed the sinuosity of the road till he reached a white gate, which glistened in the gloom. This he pushed open, and found himself in a narrow path, which was plentifully encumbered with stones and brambles, but which nevertheless led up the mountain-side towards a mansion of considerable magnitude. The colonel quickly reached the brow of the mountain, and the mansion lay before him, an indistinct and gloomy mass in the increasing darkness. No signs of festivity and joy were there. A faint and sickly light issued from three or four of the lower windows; but all was as still and as silent as the grave. "This looks not like a bridal," thought the colonel, as he breathed more freely, and wiped the perspiration from his brow. "This looks more like the house of mourning and desolation." He walked his horse into the court before the house; and his arrival was greeted by the loud barking of curs—apparages always to be found attached to Welsh mansions—great and small. A gray-headed servant came to the door with a lantern in his hand; and as the light fell upon the colonel's fine martial figure, he started with surprise at the sight of so important a visiter at that unusual hour.

The colonel, as he alighted from the horse, inquired if Miss Morgan was at home? The old man stared in a strange manner at the question, and the colonel repeated it. "Is Miss Morgan—is Lucy within?"

"My poor mistress," replied the man, falteringly, "has been dead these three days."

"Dead!" echoed the colonel, as he staggered against the door. "Great God of Heaven! this is terrible!"

Long did poor Cynric—for he it was—remain overwhelmed by the weight of this withering intelligence. Through all his toil and peril, in all the sickening vicissitudes of his absence, was he cheered and consoled, when he thought of Lucy's love and Lucy's fidelity.

"In a life wandering her fond love
Had been to him a dear delight:
A dewy star beamed from above,
A cheering ray of gliding light."

And the shock which now fell upon him was almost too much for his bruised and broken spirit to bear. When, however, the violence of his grief had somewhat subsided, he disclosed himself to old Howel, who conducted him in silence to the apartment where Lucy's remains were lying. Here he left him; and Cynric was alone with the corpse.

* No English, sir!—the usual Welsh answer, at first, to all English questions.

What a meeting was this! To part with those we have loved, and to kiss their cold and clammy lips is, at best, but a melancholy task: and what must poor Cynric's feelings have been, under all his complication of misery and remorse! Serenely beautiful was Lucy in death; the sorrows of her existence had not passed roughly over her—but, softly withering her joyousness, had at last conquered, and reduced her to the state to which we all must come. Cynric drew off the white sheet which was thrown over the coffin; and his tears fell fast, when he saw on her marble bosom the old gold coin which he had given her at the Bethrothing! It was her wish, Howel afterwards told him, to have it buried with her; and the last words she uttered were breathed in prayer for him. "Ah! sir," said the old man, "she deserved a better destiny: but God is good, and there is no striving against fate." Cynric echoed the sentiment, for he felt its truth, as exemplified in his own unhappy existence."

Cynric remained till Lucy was buried; and then left Wales for ever. He added largely to the provisions which Lucy had made for the servants, out of the wealth which he had acquired in India; and then repaired to some distant clime, to pass the remainder of his days a restless wanderer—"a sadder and a wiser man." He was never seen in Wales again; but the scene of youthful follies—the old mansion, the woods, the river, and the "everlasting hills"—remained unchanged, echoing now to the loud and gleeful shouts of another generation, and presenting a tout ensemble of prospect, than which none can be more magnificent, more varied, or more surpassingly beautiful.

MISCELLANY.

FREEDOM CORRECTLY DELINEATED.

An Extract from an article in the Christian Examiner, by Dr. Chauncy.

Freedom, in every form, of every kind, is a transcendent privilege. Freedom of mind is a glorious gift. It is a blessing beyond all price, and beyond all power of language to express. It is of good which nothing can transcend but the use of it. That dominion in the mind, that holy retreat from violence, oppression, and wrong; that place in the soul where freedom is, with its wide and boundless range of uncontrolled thoughts, with no power to govern it but truth and right, with no presence to be worshipped but the presence of the Divinity—it is the chosen dwelling place of our most precious thoughts. But then it is a "holy place," and to be entered with trembling. It is like the flaming mount of old, glorious indeed, but sending out awful voices, to warn the rash intruder. It is dangerous because it is glorious. Freedom of mind, like every exalted trust, like lofty intellect, immense wealth, and vast dominion, should inspire a solicitude, care, and fidelity, proportionate to the magnitude of the trust. It does not, then, become the dignity and manliness of free citizens to look with idle admiration upon their institutions, as children do upon the show and glitter of a military parade, never considering the anarchy and distress to which it may easily be turned. Such are "childish things," which it becomes a wise people "to put away." A free people must reflect, must understand their privileges, and must solemnly and virtuously resolve to preserve them, or in that fearful poise between good and evil where liberty places them, they will inevitably fall into evil, disorder, and destruction. We would address ourselves, if our words could reach them, to men who are high in office. The inquiry often presses itself on our minds, and with unfeigned solicitude, whether the distinguished men in this country are looking with a sober sense of their duty and a deep feeling of their responsibility, to the great experiment to which they are contributing so much to bring to a happy or a fatal issue! There may be those among them to whom all talk about their duties would pass for nothing better than cant. May God deliver this country from many such! If there ever were men to whom duty should be a serious word, who should tremble at their responsibility to God and man, they are the leading statesmen, orators, and teachers, whether religious or political, of this nation. If we could address them, we would say, "No men ever enjoyed such an opportunity as is given to you for accomplishing the best hopes of patriotism and philanthropy. Solon, Aristides, Demosthenes, the Fabii, Cato, and Cicero, had no such materials to work with as you have, in the intelligence and virtue of this free people. To all human view, the last great experiment of republican freedom that is likely to be tried for ages is passing under your guidance. The eyes of the world are upon you. Ages that have passed in the noble strife for liberty, ages of patriot tears and blood, call upon you, and unborn generations echo the call to you, to be faithful to the solemn trust. For God's sake, and your country's, let us intreat and beseech you to hear the call. The happiness of one family is a sacred charge. What then must be the happiness of millions through unknown periods! With these multitudes, it is not too serious to say, you must yet bow low before the seat of Almighty justice. And then when the dazzling world, with all its splendid honours, has passed away, one word of benediction from that throne of eternal truth and honour shall be more than all the wreaths, the titles, the offices, the distinctions, that the world can heap upon you."

We hear much of the spirit of this age; but it seems more an object to dwell with exultation on the tendencies of the public mind at this day, than to point out the duties of the age. We believe, indeed, that the present epoch promises more than any former period in the long continued experiment upon human nature, because Christianity is in the field, more free and unfettered than it ever was before; because knowledge is in the field; because "the schoolmaster is abroad," upon the field of this great trial; and if men can become free, wise and religious, it may be hoped that they will become so now. But to conduct this experiment to a successful issue will require exertions—yes, and qualities, on the part of its friends, which they never can too highly appreciate. The men who are to take part in the work of bringing this momentous trial to a happy result, (and every man may do something;) must feel that patriots, prophets, and confessors, had never a greater. They must not then sleep upon their post. They must be awake, and on the alert, and watch the signs of the times. This is no affair of political management, of commercial monopoly, of relief to the manufacturing interests, of internal improvements, of national administration—save as all these bear upon the great end. No; but the great question is, whether the people of this country, and of England, and France, and Germany, and Russia, shall be wiser, more virtuous, religious, and happy races of men, fifty years hence, than they now are? It is not whether general wealth and luxury shall advance; they will advance—but whether governments shall become more just, mild, and paternal, whether schools and universities shall be more effective instruments for training the mind; whether cities shall be purified from their vices, and families shall be well-ordered, virtuous, pious, and happy; whether churches shall become purer, and knowledge shall increase, and righteousness exalt the nations. And to this question, we repeat, all men, and minds, and books written at this day, and journals, and associations, and communities, should be awake.

THE MARCH OF INTELLECT.

A SHANDIAN DIALOGUE.

Vie glau sen in der che spor denan—Dante.

Dr. Slop. This is a wonderful age we live in, Captain Shandy. We are continually making the most surprising discoveries, and most astonishing improvements in every thing. Look now, the whole world is alive; every thing is turned topsy-turvy. Old things are passed away, all things are become new. We are unriddling all the phenomena of nature, making metaphysics as plain as day, and driving on crescendo in all departments. As Mr. Finn says,

"Every thing does go by steam now."

Parson Cullcushion said in his last sermon under his thirteenth general head, that the march of intellect was the grand characteristic of the age in which we live.

Uncle Toby. If I remember right, Paul Pry says something to the same effect.

Dr. Slop. Paul Pry was rather of opinion that the age was characterised by the spirit of inquiry.

Uncle Toby. Well, that is pretty much the same thing. Every thing is found out by inquiry. It is the grand pioneer in the march of improvement, which I suppose is what you mean by the march of intellect.

Dr. Slop. Not exactly, Captain Shandy.—Things may improve without intellect's advancing. Thus, Susannah handles the warming-pan with more dexterity than formerly; she has improved in the management of it, yet there is no march of intellect in the case.

Uncle Toby. I don't understand that, Doctor. Intellect is intellect, whether it be exercised upon warming-pans or the wisdom of Solomon.

Dr. Slop. The distinction lies here, Captain Shandy, it is all in the philosophy of the thing. Now Susannah has not a philosophical notion of the warming-pan and its properties and operations; she goes about the thing in an empirical fashion, as we of the faculty say.

Uncle Toby. Pray, Doctor Slop, where is the advantage of having a philosophical notion of warming a bed? I should as soon think of charging bayonet in a philosophical fashion. I thought it was all a straight forward business—force a breach in the curtain, carry the covertway, and then make a lodgment.

Dr. Slop. That is a common error. Nothing can be a greater mistake than to imagine that the general concerns of human business depend upon such simple operations. There is philosophy in every thing, and we now begin to find it out.

Trim. Please your honour that is just what Simon Spout said the other evening in his speech at Faneuil Hall. Says he, Mr. Chairman, this is the age of improvement; every man must become his own teacher, his own legislator, and his own philosopher. We must keep pace with the spirit of the age, and diffuse the light of knowledge over the land, thereby dispelling the darkness of this enlightened community.

Dr. Slop. Ay, the spirit of the age is really progressing, as we say in this country. We are doing wonders, by means of societies; there are societies now for every thing in rerum natura.

Trim. Yes, your honour. There is Obadiah belongs to the "March of Intellect Society."

Dr. Slop. Indeed?

Trim. Yes, your honour. And Susannah, the housemaid, belongs to the Union Young Men's Education Society.

Uncle Toby. A very effective member, I dare say.

Trim. And Jonathan, the coachman, belongs to the Grand Railway Temperance Society.

Dr. Slop. Ah! Total abstinence is now the order of the day. Great improvements, Captain Shandy; drinking is nearly done with, and it is now pretty clearly proved that eating must share the same fate. It is all a beastly sort of business. Meat was not made to eat nor wine to drink. So it has been proved in the pulpit.

Uncle Toby. You don't say so.

Dr. Slop. Oh yes, proof positive. I wish you had heard Mr. Screechowl's sermon on the subject. It was a most ingenious and convincing piece of logic. Said he, "I am astonished that this intelligent and virtuous community should shut their eyes to the progress of this growing evil."

Uncle Toby. Very ingenious and logical truly.

Dr. Slop. "And my hearers," said he, "we live in a lagd pre-eminent for every blessing under heaven; we are increasing in wealth and prosperity beyond all example; we are held in high esteem throughout the world, for our virtue and sobriety, yet truth compels me to say, that we are a nation of drunkards, and are fast driving into the pit of destruction."

Uncle Toby. And this sermon he sat in his closet and wrote for the benefit of his hearers and the information of the world. A most excellent device for enlightening mankind! Pray, where did he get his knowledge of the subject?

Dr. Slop. Out of the Temperance papers.

Uncle Toby. Temperance papers! What is a Temperance paper! in the name of gunpowder! Dr. Slop. Bless me! don't you know? Why, a Temperance paper is a sheet filled with all the tales of drunkenness that can be raked and scraped out of every nook and corner of the twenty-four states.

Uncle Toby. I should think it must be a most precious jumble of filthy abominations.

Dr. Slop. Not at all, not at all; it is the most interesting thing in the world. There is every variety of jollification, from "How came you so," to "Drunk as a fiddler." It is the most delightful thing in the world to read. I would advise you to look at them. You can not conceive what wonders the march of intellect is doing.

Trim. An please your honour, there was one left in the kitchen last week, and Obadiah read it through. He said it was a greater provocative to drink than a salt herring.

Uncle Toby. The march of intellect! with a vengeance.

Trim. And Deborah, the scullion, belongs to the Grand Supernumerary Auxiliary Foreign Missionary Society.

Uncle Toby. What, in the name of cannon balls and bomb-shells, has that foolish fat scullion to do with foreign missions! She does not know ten letters of the alphabet, and could not, for the soul of her, tell whether the inhabitants of Cape Cod were Jews, Pagans or Christians.

Dr. Slop. Oh that matters not, Captain Shandy. I think it doubtful whether one half of them are much better informed; but we must forward the march of intellect among the heathen.

Trim. And Parson Yorick belongs to a Peace Society.

Uncle Toby. A Peace Society!

Dr. Slop. Yes, a Peace Society. A society for the extirpation of war.

Uncle Toby. Our armies swore terribly in Flanders, but if they had heard of such a thing as a Peace Society, they would have done worse.

Dr. Slop. But don't you think it an excellent plan! Now I conceive it to be a great proof of the march of intellect in these days, that such an ingenious project should be started. It will put an end to fighting at once.

Uncle Toby. How so, Doctor!

Dr. Slop. Why, if we get all the European monarchs, the Grand Turk, the Emperor of China, the Bashaw of Tripoli, the Dey of Algiers, the Pope, the Shah of Persia, the Khan of Tartary, the Great Mogul, and the King of Bantam to come into the plan, there will be an universal agreement that no one shall molest another.

Uncle Toby. Excellent, Doctor! But suppose one of the parties to this peaceable agreement should take it into his head to break the bargain.

Dr. Slop. Why, then the rest must make war upon him and bring him to terms.

Uncle Toby. Make war!

Dr. Slop. Yes, to preserve peace.

Uncle Toby. What sort of a doctrine is that?

Dr. Slop. Oh, the march of intellect. You can not conceive what wonders the march of intellect is doing.

[Enter Obadiah.]

Obadiah. Oh Captain Shandy, you can't conceive what an accident has happened! Indeed it was not my fault. You can't say it was my fault, your honour.

Uncle Toby. No, I can not say it was any body's fault till I know what it is.

Obadiah. Why, the cows have broken into the bowling-green and demolished all your fortifications!

Uncle Toby. Mercy on me! what, all my preparations for the siege of Adrianople!

Obadiah. Yes, your honour; they have trampled down the ramparts, hooked up the citadel, and whisked away the half-moon with their tails.

Uncle Toby. Oh, shade of Vauban! Is the whole city demolished!

Obadiah. All but one side of a bastion, and a yard and a half of a redan.

Uncle Toby. And how came this?

Obadiah. The cows broke through a fence, while I was away.

Uncle Toby. Why did not Jonathan drive the cows away!

Obadiah. Jonathan was attending the monthly meeting of the Grand Railway Temperance Society.

Uncle Toby. Well then; could not Susannah do it!

Obadiah. Oh no, your honour; Susannah had gone to the Young Men's Education Society.

Uncle Toby. And was there nobody else belonging to the house!

Obadiah. Nobody but the scullion, and she was at a meeting of the Foreign Missionary Society.

Uncle Toby. And pray, Mr. Obadiah, where was you!

Obadiah. I was at the March of Intellect Society, to hear the Grand Quarterly Report.

Uncle Toby. Really, Doctor Slop, I must allow that the March of Intellect is doing wonders. It has marched the servants out of the house, and marched the cows into my fortifications.

SUNDAY MAILS. The subject of Sunday Mails is again agitated in many parts of the Union, and editorial lucubrations on the subject are poured forth most profusely, and meetings for and against the proposed change in the post office laws and regulations are got up in abundance. The subject will undoubtedly again be brought before congress, but there is very little reason to believe that the majority will differ from the determination of last year. The commercial interests of the nation are opposed to any modification of existing rules, and all liberal minded men esteem legislation upon religious creeds dangerous to the welfare of the country.

A large meeting of the citizens of Rochester Monroe co. opposed to any change in the post-office policy, was held on the 5th inst. A long and ably written preamble and a number of resolutions were adopted. The preamble takes a broad and able view of the subject, and successfully maintains that no law at present exists requiring the transportation of the mails on Sunday, and that the necessity and policy of continuing them are properly referable to the post master general. It recognizes as important "to our country and our republican institutions" the devotion, "by common consent, of one day in seven to the moral and religious culture and instruction of our citizens;" and also "the propriety of the Government sanctioning in its acts of administration and its practice, such an observance of the first day of the week (being the day generally observed for that purpose), in all cases where it may comport with the great and peculiar interests of the country which it has in charge." It rejoices that such is in general the practice in every department of the government, but "most solemnly and earnestly protests against any and every act of legislation, compelling or enjoining, directly or indirectly, any religious observances whatsoever."

"ANTI-MASONICK DAGGERS," AGAIN! The Ulster anti-masonick paper says, that while Avery Allyn was engaged in exhibiting his anti-masonick flummery and buffoonery "at Esopus, on Monday evening, a warrant was issued against him for exhibiting without license, and that when the constable attempted to arrest him, Allyn STABBED him through the hand!" Here is anti-masonry, with a vengeance! The laws are violated to support its cause—a warrant is issued against the offender, and he, to escape arrest, and relying on his anti-masonick sanctity, STRABBLES THE OFFICER! Such are the legitimate fruits of the excitement—its moderation, its humanity, its justice and its patriotism! Is it possible that honest and thinking men can countenance such deeds? Can christians contemplate them and not shudder?

Extract of a letter to the Editor of the Record, from a friend in Pennsylvania, dated December 7, 1829: "The antics may 'chuckle' as much as they please about Ritner's vote, it does anything but prove that they are 50,000 strong; it is well known that thousands voted for Ritner in consequence of the disaffection to the nomination of governor Wolf. General Barnard was evidently the most prominent candidate, and only missed the nomination by the division in his own county (Chester), by the admission of 'Spurious Delegates' from the county: hence may the large vote of Ritner be accounted for, and on no other grounds."

MR. BOOTH. The Dramatick Mirror, of Tuesday, gives an account of a singular affair, which happened at the Tremont Theatre, Boston, on Monday evening. It is known to most play-going people, that Mr. Booth, the great tragedian, is subject to paroxysms of partial insanity, and those who have read the newspaper accounts of the gentleman's recent adventures at New-York and Baltimore, have learned that these mental aberrations have lately visited him more frequently than formerly. We have no room this week for any more than the following extract from the statement in the Dramatick Mirror:

The play was announced as Mr. Booth's benefit and last appearance. The tragedy of Edgar was to be performed, in which Mr. Booth, Mr. Polby, and Mrs. Duff were to appear in the parts of Ludovic, Colonne and Evadne. The afterpiece of Amateurs and Actors was to give occasion for Mr. Booth to play in a comic character; and there was also to be a new comic recitation by Mr. Finn, together with other musical entertainments. All these circumstances, set out with the customary parade in the bills, created an attraction of no ordinary degree, and added to the expectation that the actor, at his benefit, would exert himself to show his powers in their highest excellence, with a view to repay in some measure the obligation which he lay under to the Boston public for their kind forbearance on the occasion of his former delinquency, succeeded in drawing one of the most splendid assemblies that have ever graced the boxes of the Tremont theatre. Not a nook or corner of the dress circles was unoccupied. Great numbers, after vainly attempting to squeeze themselves into the pit, were forced to leave the house, and others were thought well bestowed among the tenants of those elevated regions, whence a bird's eye view may be had, but nothing prospective. A more splendid audience and one more highly excited by expectation, we have not for a long time seen, and a more singular and severe disappointment of the kind has, we think, rarely been experienced.

At Mr. Booth's very first entrance upon the stage, something unusual was visible in his manner. He was careless, slovenly and hesitating in his discourse; his countenance had none of its customary expression; his gestures and attitudes were any thing but elegant and appropriate, and his language was uttered without any regard to those nice modulations of emphasis, tone and cadence for which his delivery has been distinguished. He would falter in his discourse; jumble scraps of other plays into his dialogue, run to the prompter's side of the stage and lean against the sidecase, while the prompter endeavored to help him forward in the play by speaking out his part of the dialogue loud enough to be heard in the galleries. In this manner he made a shift to get through the first two acts of the tragedy. "Those familiar with the theatre saw very plainly that something was rotten in the state of Denmark; but a great proportion of the very crowded audience present, not knowing much of his manner of acting, did not comprehend the business, but only looked on, stared, gaped, and wondered, and protested that for an actor of so much celebrity, Mr. Booth played in a very spiritless, bungling fashion.

However, his bizarrie soon came to a crisis. In the early part of the third act, while engaged in parlance with the King of Naples, the audience were surprised by his suddenly breaking off from the measured, heroic dignity of his stage tone, and with a comical zipper, falling at once into a colloquial gossiping sort of chatter with his Majesty, thus, "Upon my word Sir, I don't know Sir," &c. The audience were thrown into as much astonishment as the King of the Two Sicilies at Signor Ludovico's sudden and antipoeitical down come from his bearded height of declamation. For a moment all was silence; when Mr. Booth turning round and facing the spectators began to address them in this manner,—"Ladies and Gentlemen; I really don't know this part. I studied it only once before, much against my inclination. I will read the part, and the play shall go on. By your leave, the play shall go on, and Mr. Wilson shall read the part for me. Here an overpowering burst of hissing and exclamations arose from all parts of the house, while Mr. Booth continued to face the audience with a ginning look which at length broke out into an open laugh. Mr. Smith then rushed from behind the scenes upon the stage and led him off. Mr. Booth exclaimed, "I can't read—I am a charity-boy; I can't read. Take me to the Lunatick Hospital!"

After much trouble other entertainments were substituted for those promised. We understand that Mr. Booth will soon visit this city, and perform at our theatre.

THE THEATRE. We have not been much to the Theatre this week, and therefore have not much to say about it. We believe the house has been poorly attended on every evening except Thursday, when Mrs. Barnes took her benefit—the boxes were then filled with the fashion of the city. We had "other fish to fry," and did not go. A new drama, called the Sister of Charity was produced, but as we did not witness it, we shall not speak of it. A brief historical and characteristic sketch of Les Sœurs de la Charité may be found in the Record of the 15th August last, (No. 29, page 229.)

☞ The entertainments of this evening are for the benefit of Mr. Barnes, and Mr. Parker and his two daughters. The performances will consist of the very attractive drama of Massanillo, dancing, and the 2d a last acts of the Hypocrite. The parts of Guiseppe Aniello and Mawworm by Mr. Barnes, those of Penella and Charlotte by Mrs. Barnes—being their last appearance. The little Misses Parker are really worth seeing—they dance delightfully

☞ Mr. George Dixon, who calls himself the "celebrated American buffo singer," advertises his benefit for Monday evening, and among other things, he promises to sing the "new prize medley song, written by J. H. Stone, esq. of New-York." Now, we have no objection to the "celebrated" Mr. Dixon's taking a benefit, but it is due to Mr. Stone to say that he did not write the song in question; in a note to the editor of the New-York Courier and Enquirer, he denies all knowledge concerning it, and the consequent supposition is that the "celebrated American buffoon" has practiced a little knavery to "put money in his purse." Dixon's singing has not been beneficial to the character of the theatre; it creates a chuckle in the pit and galleries, but the better portion of every audience turns from it with disgust. We have no doubt he will have a good benefit; for every one who is at all acquainted with theatrical affairs, knows that mimicry and clownish vulgarity are more willingly and more liberally paid for, than chaste and legitimate acting. This is not the managers' fault, but the fault of the public. Those who are in pursuit of wealth will traffic in the wares which yield them the greatest profit.

☞ Mr. Forrest, one of the meritorious managers, and a very respectable actor, will take his benefit on Wednesday next. May he have a bumper.

ST. NICHOLAS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY. This Society celebrated their anniversary on Monday evening at the American Hotel. A large party of about one hundred and twenty gentlemen partook of a sumptuous supper, prepared with great taste and magnificence under the personal superintendence of Mr. Drake. The spacious dining room was beautifully decorated; festoons and garlands of flowers were suspended from the ceiling and the chandeliers. The dishes were ornamented with rosettes and garlands of orange ribbon, and at the lower end of the room the Society's banner of "Orange Ribbon" was conspicuously displayed. The walls were covered with standards and paintings, and from immediately above the ample chandelier of the venerable President, a large artificial sun shot forth its deep crimson rays.

Mr. Drake has certainly been justly entitled to the gratitude and praise of every true son of St. Nicholas, for the great pains he took to have every thing of the best kind served up in the very best manner. The bill of fare comprised, besides every delicacy of the season, all the national dishes of Holland: there were Suppau and de Melk, Hoof Kaas, Zuit, Hokken en Poetjes, Kool Slaa, (heet en koud) Kollentje, Worst, Gortuyl Penk.

The Society had the honour and pleasure to entertain, as guests, the acting governor of the state, their honours the Mayor and Recorder, several revolutionary Patriots, and some gentlemen members of other national societies in this city.

The evening passed off with the greatest hilarity and good humour; all the fine feelings of the heart were stirred up at this annual congregation of the descendants of Hollanders—the sons of St. Nicholas love to call to mind the domestic virtues, as well as the heroisms, that characterized their ancestors, and in these piping times of peace are content to imitate their industry and frugality. Should the occasion demand it, we have little doubt they would show that the gallant spirit of their sires had not expired. To borrow from one of the toasts of the evening, they would readily substitute the Cannon Ball for the Udder Kool, should their rights or liberties be invaded.

Mr. Secretary Van Buren, Chevalier Huygens, general Philip Van Cortlandt, colonel Willet, colonel Rutgers, and several other patriots of the revolution were invited to participate in the annual festival; the two former pleaded their official duties at Washington, and the rest the increasing infirmities of old age and the season of the year, as their apologies for declining the invitation. Each of them, however, favored the society with an appropriate sentiment, which we publish below. After the cloth was removed, and the toasts had been returned by the Rev. Dr. Ludlow, (chaplain of the society,) the following standing and volunteer toasts were drunk, embraced by airs and marchions an excellent band of music, stationed in the anti-room.

VOLUNTEERS.

By the president, (Abraham Van Vechten.) Characteristics of an unadulterated Dutchman—Industry, frugality and honesty, united with an ardent love of civil and religious liberty, and an undaunted zeal to maintain it.

Gov. Throop being called on for a sentiment, rose and addressed the company as follows

I take pleasure in presenting to you the name of an individual whose past and present life is an exemplification of the Dutch virtues, so well described in his toast. I give you the name of Abraham Van Vechten, President of this society.

A letter was read from Chevalier Huygens, Dutch minister to the U. States, (who had been invited to attend this celebration) expressing his gratitude for the honour conferred on him, and his regret that official duties deprived him of the pleasure of associating with his friends on this occasion. He asked to have the following toast presented in his name.

The Saint Nicholas Benevolent Society. Elze vyryge instelling. Monge zy bydrage—de Patroon van Kindervreugd in waarde te houden en by hien van het feest, aan nationale tradities indagig maken—wel byzonder aan de Neder Duitche spruk: Dat nationale vreugd is nationale deugd.

Translation.

The Saint Nicholas Benevolent Society. A liberal Institution—may he contribute to maintain in honour the Patron of Children's joy, and by the celebration of that feast call to mind national traditions, and particularly the Dutch saying; that national joy is national virtue.

An invitation had also been sent to Martin Van Buren, who is a member of the society, requesting his attendance. An answer from him was read, expressing the pleasure he enjoyed in sharing the convivialities of the society, and deeply regretted that public duties deprived him of the pleasure of joining with them at this time. He asked the favour of offering the following sentiment.

The memory of the late John V. Henry—Justly distinguished for integrity, talents and gentlemanly manners.

Gen. Philip Van Cortlandt had likewise been invited to participate. In his reply, he says he should be extremely happy to enjoy the company of his very highly respected friends, but his advanced age and the cold season prevented him from attending. He hoped the society would accept the following sentiment

The St. Nicholas Benevolent Society of the City of Albany—May they never want good Olycooks for their friends, nor cannon balls for their enemies.

Col. Marinus Willet of New-York, had also been requested to attend this festivity. In his reply, he offered his acknowledgements for the honour conferred upon him, and expressed his sincere regrets that the infirmities of old age would not permit him the pleasure of being present on so memorable occasion.

After Col. Willet's letter had been read, the President offered the following toast:

The memory of the heroes and sages, whose achievements adorn the historic pages of the land of our fore-fathers.

By Jacob Ten Eyck, (3d V. President.) Holland—She furnished to the pilgrims a refuge from oppression, and means to their descendants to achieve their independence.

POETRY.

The following beautiful poem, is a production from the pen of James William Miller, a young poet of great promise, who, as our readers have already been informed, through the medium of the public prints died a few months since in the West Indies. He was the principal editor of the Boston Literary Gazette, a paper of uncommon merit, which was never sufficiently appreciated by the public in this city, and which was subsequently united with the Yankee.

There are many bright gems of poetry scattered through the journals of this country, that were thrown about by Mr. Miller with a prodigal hand, which if collected in a single volume would be at once an honour to our native literature, and a lasting monument to the surviving memory of the dead poet.

THE EPICUREAN AT THE FEAST OF ISIS.

There was an ancient custom amongst them (the Egyptians) of placing at their feast a skeleton, to remind the guests of their mortality.

He sat in the banquet hall,
In the stranger's honoured place;
Beneath his glance was gathered all
The pride of the human face,—
For sable priest and vestal white
Unveiled their sacred brows that night.

They poured the red wine then,
And young fresh lips were wet,
And matrons grave, and bearded men
Smiled as their glances met:
But there was One on whom his eye
Rest, as on his Destiny.

Around each happy brow,
Were nodding chaplets bright,
And lotus bloom and myrtle bough
Glanced to the banquet light:
Yet there was one dim silent wreath
Motionless as the crown of Death.

All other eyes were freed,
And answering look to look;
And he in them gay thoughts might read,
As in a pleasant brook:
But in that veiled Mystery
Were shrouded things not meet for glee.

Mirth floated up, and song,
Timbrel and cymbal's clank,
Soft lute and golden lyre along
The fretted arches rang:
Yet from that Form to catch one strain
He listened painfully—in vain.

Nor voice nor music broke
The fearful stillness there;
Sights, sounds, that mirth and joy awoke,
Went by as silent air:
He saw no eye, he heard no song:
Alone, save one, in that great throng.

They parted soon away;
Stern priest and vestal grave,
All passed: the wasted naptha's ray,
But shadowy dimness gave:
Yet pageant passed, and parting word,
As banquet bygone, unseen, unheard.

For still the Form sat there;
And he grew pale and cold;
Yet when the torches' dying glare
Gleamed on its mantle fold,
He roused him—for he deemed it stirred—
And listened,—but there was no word.

"Now speak, thou One of dread!
Speak to me, here alone!"
As from the chamber of the dead,
Came back the echoed tone;
And, from each sculptured niche about,
Grim specters and crocodile peered out,

He rose: the fading lamp
Shook in his nerveless clasp,
The mantle folds, hung thick and damp
Within his frenzied grasp:
"I will unveil thee—I will know
What art thou that dost chill me so."

Flashed up the flame, and shone
With one expiring ray:
The white bones of the skeleton
Glared on him where he lay:
And he hath blessed the dark, that o'er
That formless Form is veiled once more.

Ha! Epicurean,
Where now thy boasted mirth?
Proud reveller: art thou this was
Clod of thy mother earth?
And hast thou come, at last, to see
What human mirth and pride must be?

The morning sun streamed bright
Through wreathed jasmine,
And hung its tranquil, chequered light,

On temple dome and shrine;
Then turned the Epicurean
Back to his bark, a wiser man.

"THE GOOD OLD TIMES," NO. 2.*

I wish the fashions were the same
As thirty years ago,
I can't imagine what can make
The tailors change them so:
When I was in my youth I made
A coat of homespun do,
And thought it very fine to have
My hat tied in a queue.

And in those days our breeches were
All buckled at the knee,
And silver buckles would ensure
The best of company;
Our beavers were of comely shape,
And kept off sun and rain—
Oh how I wish those broad brimmed hats
Would come in vogue again.

I'm troubled with a half a yard
Of cloth about my feet;
My coat is made so very small,
The laps will hardly meet;
Tight knees are all the fashion now,
And shoes must have square toes;—
Where Fashion will arrive at last,
The tailor only knows.

The dandies of the present day,
Have watch chains all of gold,
You'd think their monstrous pocket book
Was filled with wealth untold!
My father wore a silver watch
And eke a good steel chain,
And well I recollect his strait
Old pewter headed cane.

He owned a large and thrifty farm
Of wood and meadow land,
And always had a plenty of
The dollar coins on hand:—
I guess some dashing friends of mine,
Would find it rather hard,
To pay for coats they're wearing now,
At "Two pounds ten per yard."

But as for me, I wish I had
My silver dollars back,
I'd recollect my father's ways,
And tread the same old track;
I'd never do as I have done,
Risk hundreds on a bet,
Nor be obliged so oft to cry,
"Clean pockets here to let."

INVOCATION.

Spirit of the sleeper's dream,
Weave thy spell for me,
By that spell I know thee well,
Thing of mystery.
Come to me at the moonlit hour,
Whisper to me then,
And revive the faded flower,
Though it die again.

Come to me when darkly flows
Life's mixed tide along,
Breathe upon the heart repose,
Though it wake to wrong.

Spirit of the chainless soul,
Mid the azure air,
When the stars of midnight roll,
Let me worship thee.

Spirit of the resting hour,
Twine thy mystick wreath,
Give me sleep, the calm, the deep,
Though the sleep be death.

THE SAVOYARD'S SONG.

Far away, far away,
By Geneva's blue waters in gladness we dwell;
Kind hands there caressed us,
Sweet voices there blessed us,
As low at our vesper devotions we knelt—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
One morn flew our father's light vessel in pride,
But the storm gathered o'er,
And his bark came no more;—

*"The Good Old Times," No. 1, was published in the Record, number 41.

Our father's bones sleep in Geneva's blue tide—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
Our heart-broken mother gazed out on the wave;
O'er her children she sighed,
For her husband she died;
On Geneva's green bank is our mother's cold grave—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
From the haunts of our childhood in scorn we were driven:
Left of kindred and home,
The wide earth we must roam,
No hope but in you, and no trust but in Heaven—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
The poor Savoyard orphans tomorrow must go;
Then pity, kind strangers,
The world's friendless rangers,
And bless with your bounty our journey of woe—
Far away.

STANZAS.

"Thou too art gone, thou loved and lovely one." [Byron.]

I trod my own bright home last night;
The breeze was fresh, the floweret fair;
All stood enwrapped in fairy light—
Thou wast not there.

Soft woke my childhood's careless chord,
And wreaths we did together twine,
And deep, sweet murmuring voices poured—
All, all but thine.

The merry lights flashed sunshine then,
And hearts were there in primal glee;
I heard the thrilling notes again,
And turned for thee.

There gushed the stream, there blushed the grove,
All bright affection's hallowed spot,
All bound with thousand links of love—
But thou wast not.

Oh, parted far! yet fancy's chain
Clings close through many a cloud and care;
And when my night home wakes again,
Oh, meet me there.

This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine, he trusted with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself, with the size, strength and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on theacking. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding house keepers—to masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

MASONIC RECORD.

The juror being questioned says that among the degrees he took were those of "Entered Apprentice," "Fellowcraft," and "Master Mason;" has sat with the defendant in the lodge at Gaines, as a master mason; has also met Dr. Nicholson in the same place.

Doctor Nicholson examined, says he is a master mason, and received the degrees in Gaines lodge; has seen Mr. Dolly there as an officer of the lodge, he thinks. Witness thinks there are by-laws in writing. It is a fundamental principle of the institution, that members can only be admitted through certain forms and ceremonies. There are certain obligations to be taken, let us to all signs, the candidate is sworn to obey all regular signs and summonses, he is bound, or sworn to him as a brother mason. (Of the degree named, or by a regularly constituted lodge of the same.) 3d, as to signs of distress, the substance of the obligation is, that it binds the candidate on discovering or receiving a certain sign, or hearing certain words, to fly to the relief of the persons making them, there is a great probability of saving the life of his brother from losing his own. There is a sign accompanying the oath, and also motions, which may be accompanied or not by words. It was imparted to him, and all whom he has seen. Inducted into lodge, and is among the ceremonies of admission of each member. 3d, as to signs, the substance of the obligation is, that the candidate binds himself to apprise his brother of all approaching danger, if in his power. 4th, as to keeping secrets, the obligation binds the candidate to keep as inviolable in his own breast as in the breast of his brother who communicates, when communicated to him as such, all secrets, MURDER AND TREASON EXCEPTED, and those left to the free will and accord of the candidate. As to the first clause, witness has repeated all the oaths at that point; as to the 2d, the same, 3d, the same, 4th, the same. Witness has frequently met Dolly in Gaines Lodge, but has no recollection that Dolly was there when he was admitted. There is nothing in the obligation requiring him affirmatively to obey the laws; does not recollect, and cannot say there was not, has heard the obligations repeated often, and has no doubt there is an obligation concerning obeying laws. There was no explanation given to the oaths at the time they were taken, there are charges, advice, or instructions given to a candidate, after taking the oath, but whether from a book or not, witness cannot tell. One strong feature in the charge is an injunction of secrecy, and also that he should be a good citizen, or a good and loyal subject; this is the charge in the first degree, does not recollect that this is repeated afterwards. It may be; cannot name any other feature in this or any subsequent charge; the candidate is told before admission that the obligation is not to interfere with his religious or political sentiments; the candidate has no other information given him about the obligation, and is told that other masons have gone the same way before him. Lectures are given, which are explanations of certain signs and tokens, used in admission and in labour; there is also a kind of moral deduced from symbols, the square and compass, bible, &c., the tools of operative masons, and application and instruction is made therefrom, for the benefit of the candidate, and his duty as a mason, principally, but not exclusively pointed out. Cross Examined—Has often seen some of the obligations in print, and heard them all repeated out of the lodge; stated before that the obligation made less impression on his mind when delivered, than the charge, and that the charge was received as an explanation of his duty as a mason. As to the 2d clause of the obligation, as marked above, it is said somewhere in the course of the ceremony, that he is not to use a sign of distress unless he is in real danger, or he is in imminent danger; thinks it is not in the obligation, but cannot say. As to the obeying laws, there is a warning, "I will be the length of my cable towed," which refers to some distance; the word "obeying" is used somewhere here, and so nothing is said about obeying the sign except in the lodge. Witness has now resorted to detached parts of several of the obligations. The substance of another point in the obligations, is, the candidate swears to relieve the wants of a brother, his widow and orphans if he can, as far as his own position requires, and his ability will allow, without injury to himself or family. The substance of a charge to an entered apprentice, to sum it all up, enjoined it upon him to be a VERY GOOD MAN; to perform this duty to men and masons, and be JUST and VIRTUOUS, BENEVOLENT and CHARITABLE, and all the other degrees are similar; a brother is not to wrong a brother of one cent. The ceremonies are always accompanied by RELIGIOUS SERVICES, PRAYERS ARE READ—THE BIBLE IS USED FOR SWEARING THE CANDIDATES, AND IN THE COURSE OF THE CEREMONY IS GIVEN TO THE CANDIDATE AS A RULE AND GUIDE OF HIS CONDUCT. Witness acquired a knowledge of the fundamental principles of masonry from passing through the degrees. The Gaines lodge existed before he was a member; thinks he subscribed to its by-laws, and was bound in the obligations to observe them; persons sat there when he might or might not have taken the obligations of that lodge; there might have been some members. There was an accession of members in 1923. Witness thinks he knows Dolly to have been a member; the names are kept on the by-laws, and in a book kept by the secretary; believes he has heard Dolly's name read by the secretary from the roll, but does not feel confident. A man cannot become a mason by paying any sum and signing any by-laws; and the imposition of the witness is, that he must have a recommendation from some other lodge, and must sign the by-laws. A person desirous of becoming a member of a lodge, must make himself known as a freemason, by signs or words, the signs, &c., were required to be the same as those communicated to witness; these were evidence to the lodge that the candidate was a freemason; and these signs would be evidence to the Gaines lodge that the candidate had taken the same oaths required to be taken by the Gaines lodge. Cross Examined—Does not know how masons are made in Vermont, or any where else out of Gaines lodge; his knowledge about the law of Gaines lodge, in regard to the admission of members, was obtained from the practice and custom of the lodge; his opinions are derived from witnessing these customs, receiving signs and tokens, hearing charges and lectures, and from the by-laws, rules and regulations; cannot say he has been present when a visitor member applied for admission, but thinks he has; thinks an oath is administered to the visitor as to his being a freemason, but is not positive.

Dr. Nicholson called again. From his knowledge of the members of the chapter, and from the laws, &c., says it is an ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS; the terms used are "brothers" and "companions," there was a fund, and all the members contributed an initiation fee, and had a common interest in the fund. Different passages of scripture are read to different degrees. During the progress of the 7th degree (royal arch) a passage from the Old Testament is read, giving a history of the destruction of the temple, and the rebuilding of the second temple, on the return of the Jews, which is said to be the history of that degree; there is also an allusion in this degree to the "burning bush"—the candidate is directed to behold the "burning bush." So, pure is used partly for ceremony and also for other allusions. Cross Examined—Recalls no allusion to courts of justice in any ceremony; men who belong to the same chapter frequently belong to different churches and different political parties, and differ as much as other men, on philosophy and morality, and have as many law suits as others, and as much competition in all business and relations of life, and judging from their conduct, as much jealousy and rivalry; understand the nature of the Christian church, and religious associations. There is as much attachment between members of the post-templar church, as between members of the masonic fraternity, and as much sympathy and friendship with the same with members of the Baptist denomination; a Baptist would feel as much interest in a brother accused of crime as a mason. His bond is equally strong with the non-Baptist. THE OBJECT OF THE MASONIC ASSOCIATION IS TO ACCOMPLISH THE "GOD-DENIED RULE." In one of the degrees the bible is presented to the candidate in the entered apprentice degree, when the candidate is brought to light, he is presented with the bible, square and compass, the explanation of which is "the bible is given as a rule and guide of your faith and practice, the square, to square your actions, and the compass, to keep you within the bounds of what is right, but more especially with the brotherhood"; the bible, with the square and compass, is carried in the public processions of masons, it belongs to the architecture and jewels of the lodge, and in all the ceremonies the presence of a bible is necessary; certain passages concerning the Babylonian captivity are read in the 7th degree; the chapter beginning "Remember now thy Creator" is read in some of the degrees of the lodge; a religious belief is not required for admission. The words used by the royal arch mason to another in order to ascertain whether he is a mason of that degree, are these: "Question—Are you a royal arch mason? Answer—I am that I am." Cross Examined—There is no religious test required to enter a lodge, but it is required that the member should practice correctly; if he becomes immoral he is expelled. The common fund is for charity, and is under the direction of the chapter or the "committee of charity"; it may be used for furniture and it may be applied to liberate a debtor from jail, as a object of charity, but not a person imprisoned for assault and battery; the fund is wholly under the direction of a "committee of charity." Witness thinks the chapter at Gaines recognized as a superior tribunal the "Grand Chapter of the State of New York," and understood there was a contribution from this chapter to the Grand Chapter; but knows of no law requiring such contributions to be made. The object of the fund is, first, for the necessary debts and expenses of the lodge, and next for charitable purposes, then for expenses on public days; the fund is subject to the order of the lodge, but a committee of charity is generally appointed to make the disbursements. One general object of the fund is to relieve brethren in distress; there is no qualification as to the kind of distress—but the brother must be worthy; the fund is for the relief of worthy brethren, their widows and orphans, and whether they would be worthy of relief or not would be a matter of discretion; where the object was wholly unworthy, no relief would be afforded. The person relieved must be worthy, and the lodge may judge of his worthiness, but there is no other meaning to this than in ordinary language.

Jury called again. A week ago last Monday, he was asked if he thought Mather ought to be punished, and said he ought not, what witness thought and meant, was, that he did not know for a certainty anything of Mather for which he ought to be punished; the conversation referred to the Morgan affair. Witness has heard it mentioned more than once that Mather drove the carriage in which Morgan was supposed to be; has heard Jonathan Gates say he had not seen him say so, of Mather having driven the carriage, either from seeing him say so, or seeing him, which witness does not recollect; there was more information given witness by Gates, but what it was does not now remember, has an impression that Gates said something about walking beside the carriage, when driven by Mather. Cross Examined—On Monday last, at an election in Gaines lodge, a question was put to him by Sprague; a few words passed, and the question was put to him: "Do you believe that Mather ought to be punished?" did not say for what and he did not say before witness answered "No," or "I think not," and was going on to say, or was about to say (No), he had begun to speak that Mather had, once told witness he had not had any thing to do with the Morgan affair, and he had no proof to the contrary as yet; did not say his became witness discovered, as he thought, that Sprague was intoxicated, and left him. Witness did not form any opinion from what Gates told him, and never made up any decided opinion either way, but thought there was a possibility that he might be guilty, and a possibility that he might not. What Gates said did not make much impression on his mind, because he had determined to keep his mind free of the subject, and not argue or wrangle about it. The conversation with Sprague was at a time he was drawn and summoned as a juror. Witness has an attachment for Mather, which does not differ from that he entertains for other respectable acquaintances; and would not be governed by this as a juror,

Mather told witness he was a police officer, and he said that this was when he was here for trial. Witness has seen the street, who said it was an unfortunate affair, and would cost him all he was worth. Mather said he was willing to fetch the case to trial if he could have an impartial jury, but was fearful of the influence of the prejudice and excitement against masonry. Witness asked Mather in the place how he came on with his trial. Witness has never attended a meeting of the chapter since the abduction of Morgan, except once on a summons to settle some business with the lodge. Witness has been acquainted with the defendant five or six years; he seldom saw him to converse with him, but had occasionally done so, sometimes on religious subjects, and sometimes on masonry; once sat and conversed with him near his laundry for twenty or thirty minutes; his attachment to Mather was founded on what he had seen of his charity and goodness; once had more attachment to Mather on account of masonry than he has now. Witness is not a religious mason, he is on the public; his attachment to masonry and his connection with lodges and chapters had ceased, he had made up his mind within himself a great while ago, not to attend any more lodges or chapters. His first reason for this resolution was, that members did not live up to that strict rule of morality which the obligations require; another was, but he did not think he ought to spend his time in a way which he thought was of little or no importance to him, another reason was, that for the carrying off of Morgan, witness became more confirmed in his resolution not to visit lodge, because he thought from information and hearsay, that masons were concerned in it; before he does regard Mather as a brother mason, and looks upon him as a royal arch mason, and should the referee entertain feelings for him different in some respect from what he should towards Mr. Sprague, who is a stranger. Mather is drawn to him from being a mason than he otherwise would be; and witness is under greater obligations to him in some respects on that account. Witness does not expect to meet Mather in a lodge, unless summoned; if defendant should give up masonry as he has his feelings towards him would be the same as they are now. The obligation witness is under to Mather, as the same as he feels him; under to the members of the same church with himself; there a covenant, not made or related to him, to whom he is as much attached as he is to his brother; he has no more attachment or affection for the defendant than he has for other men who are as good, and are not masons. He does not know that he is more attached to the defendant because he is a mason, than he would if he were not, is under no obligation to protect him from the laws, if he should commit a crime, nor is he under obligation to be an unworthy brother, or an offender against the laws to protect or assist him. This is the way he was taught masonry. Witness is not aware of any obligation operating on his mind, by which he would be required to treat a mason differently from other men.

Jonathan Gates examined. Once inquired of Mr. Dolly if he had heard that Mather drove the carriage which contained Morgan, and thinks Dolly answered that he had. Witness then told him that Mather went through on the ridge road, and drove a carriage; has no doubt he told Dolly he saw Mather on the carriage driving, but cannot say he related any particulars, or said any thing about walking beside the carriage. The whole amount of the conversation was about Mather's driving a carriage, in which it was supposed Morgan was. Cross Examined—Witness lived near Dolly and tended mill; Dolly is a blacksmith. The conversation alluded to, took place before Dolly's house, on returning from meeting one evening; this was when the story first came out, and there was nothing but a mere rumour of the abduction. Dolly disbelieved it, and so did witness; witness told Dolly that the carriage was driving west. The question, "Was what you told Dolly true, in fact?" was objected to, and waived.

William Ruggles was then called and examined by the counsel for the defendant. Witness was a member of Gaines lodge, of which he has been senior warden and master. The charge of duty in an entered apprentice on taking his stand in the lodge, is this: "You now take your place as an entered apprentice mason—Your duty is to obey the laws of your country, or the state or government under which you live; you are to square your actions by the square of justice; to circumscribe your passions within due bounds with all mankind, but more especially with your brotherhood; to walk uprightly before men and masons; the eyes of the world are upon you, and you are not, by your conduct, to bring reproach upon yourself or upon your brethren." The bible is presented to him as the guide of his faith and practice. The charge to a fellowcraft, on taking his stand, is this: "You have advanced one step in masonry; the obligation on you to be a good man is increased; you are to consider yourself more firmly bound by the charge of duty; you are an entered apprentice." To a master mason the substance of the charge is, "to walk irreproachably, and as an example to others." As to the binding of a master mason to keep as inviolable in his breast as he gave it in Gaines lodge, "I further promise and swear, that I will keep the secrets of a brother master mason when given to me in charge, and I receive them as such, that they remain as inviolable in my breast as they would be his own, murder and treason excepted." There is no particular explanation of this, as he recollects. As to the sign of distress, the obligation is this: "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will not give a grand halting sign of distress, or the words accompanying the same, unless I am in real distress, or my life in imminent danger, or when in the body of a just and legally constituted lodge, or in some place by and a cure place, for the benefit of instruction. I furthermore promise and swear, that whenever I shall see the grand halting sign of distress, or hear the words accompanying the same, I will fly to his relief, if there is a greater probability of saving his life, than of losing my own." Examples are given illustrative of these two obligations: 1st, if I were to see a sign from a brother in danger of losing his life in an affair, or fighting, or in the dark should hear the words uttered, I should endeavour to relieve him; 2d, in case of a drowning person, or in case of fire—these examples are given as explanatory of the obligation by the master. Witness never saw nor heard that this sign might be used by a person under arrest for a breach of the law, nor that it must be obeyed in such cases. All the instructions given on that head, as to obey the laws, and the obligation to obey the sign, are confined to a WORTHY brother. There is no explanation of the obligation to obey signs and summonses—all masons understand it. The phrase "cable

Will it be believed by those who have still some regard to honour and good faith, among mankind, that the man who has given this unwilling testimony in favour of the masonic institution is a RENOWNED MASON? and that he was lately elected by the anti-masonic party, clerk of the county of Orleans? Tell it not in Gath!

low" means a certain distance, three miles, and whenever the term is used, the master thus explains it. In the obligation to keep secret, the words worthy brother are used; this may not be the case always, but it is generally so, whenever the word brother occurs. The person initiated is taught that unless he walks worthily (sober and moral) he will be reprimanded by the lodge; and if he disregards this admonition, and does not desist from his vicious practices, he will be expelled. Witness is a member of Gaines chapter; the clause in the obligation, in regard to aid and assistance is, "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will espouse the cause of a companion royal arch mason whenever I see him engaged in any quarrel or difficulty, so far as to extricate him from the same, whether right or wrong," an explanation of this clause is given before the candidate is removed from the place where he takes the obligation, by the person administering the oath, at which time an example and a word are given. The explanation is, that the object of that part of the obligation, is for the suppression of bad conduct; the example is, if one royal arch mason sees another in a violent dispute, wrangling or quarrelling, it is his duty to go to him and take hold of him; the candidate is told where to touch him, and what to say, and that his brother, when thus applied to, will heed his caution—this is the substance of the whole of that clause and explanation. Witness never saw either Dolly or Mather in the chapter. All instructions in the chapter inculcate morality and obedience to the laws, the latter, however, is not made a particular subject of charge, after the first degree. The privileges of the chapter extend to visiting companions, but these differ on resident members in some particulars. [The court decided against the admission in evidence of the construction which Gaines lodge put upon the obligations.] There are no other obligations than those recited touching the duty of the members of Gaines lodge towards persons received by them as masons. Witness thinks he was made a Royal Arch Mason, in 1828, but is not positive. The funds in the chapter and lodge are subject to the order of each body, but witness is aware of no limitation or qualification in the objects of the fund; it is the legal property of the lodge; they are the legal owners, and the fund is in their hands for certain purposes, but the members have no deed or writings directing its appropriation. Witness was made a mason in 1826, but not in Gaines lodge. He made himself known to that lodge by particular signs, without which a person could not be admitted either to the lodge or chapter. There is a law on the subject of the funds of the Grand Lodge, which are devoted to charitable purposes.

The testimony in the case of Dolly here concluded, and that part of it given by Gates was stricken out by consent of parties. The case was then summed up by the counsel, and after an able charge from the court, was submitted to the triers, who decided that JOHN DOLLY does not stand indifferent, and he was consequently REJECTED.

The name of Grinnald Davis was next drawn. He was challenged for cause by defendant and rejected.

Samuel Clark Challenged for cause, and sworn; the challenge was overruled, and he was then challenged for favour, and the two first jurors were sworn as triers. The juror was then examined. He formed an opinion that Mather is guilty. Cross Examined—His opinion was formed from reports he had heard, and what he had read; heard Gates testify that he saw Mather driving the carriage, and had read reports of trials and depositions. The charge of the court was that if the juror had formed and now has a fixed belief of Mather's guilt, he ought to be rejected, however his opinion may have been formed. Rejected.

JONATHAN WHITNEY, challenged for cause by the people: sworn, and admitted.

Amos Mansfield Challenged for cause by the defendant: sworn, and rejected.

Forbes Bishop. Challenged for cause by defendant. John B. A. Greed was sworn as a witness, and testified, that he had heard Bishop twice say he presumed Mather was guilty, and heard doubt of it. One time was a year ago last April or had not a Henderson's shop. The juror being sworn corroborated this testimony, and he was rejected.

Orlando Rogers, challenged for cause by defendant. The juror being sworn, stated that he had formed an opinion, and he was rejected.

Philo Warner, challenged for cause by defendant—sworn, has formed an opinion, and was rejected.

[Defendant's counsel now offered to prove that one of the jurors in the panel had formed and expressed an opinion, and that this fact had come to their knowledge since the juror had taken his seat. Overruled; and instructions were given to the panel was exhausted. A great number of competent jurors.

ASAHEL L. OWEN, as a juror, on oath said he had formed an opinion but thinks it one that may easily yield to testimony. Admitted.

Ira H. Beach, as spokesman, examined. Fixed belief. Rejected.

RUFUS INGERSOLL, as spokesman, examined. Says he has formed an opinion and has a fixed belief, says he has formed and expressed an opinion, but it may easily yield to testimony. Admitted.

CARLOS C. ASHLEY, as spokesman, examined. Says he has formed an opinion. In answer to a question by the counsel for the people, says he is the partner of James Mather, brother of the defendant, and has been for eighteen months.

For three months before which time he was his partner. The defendant had left the county before juror came to it. He had read the newspaper accounts of the trials, in which it was sworn that Morgan was carried off, and that a defendant drove the carriage; could not say it was not true, but it was not clear in his mind at the time; says he can hear the juror money and be governed by it without any struggle. The juror was admitted, but the counsel for the people reserved an objection.

John Morris, as spokesman, sworn. He has no opinion now on the subject, but has heretofore expressed an opinion both ways. He has read accounts on the subject of the abduction of Morgan, but they have no weight with him; has lived in the same neighbourhood with Mather, and been on friendly terms with him; they agreed in public; he has a prepossession in favour of Mather, which it would require testimony to remove. Cross Examined—has not a prepossession as to the matter in hand, or as to Mather's innocence; has no impression on the subject of his guilt or innocence; and no other prepossession in his favour than as a friend—witness means that his prepossession is such that he would not believe him guilty until proved to be so; should be a little afraid to trust himself; if the evidence against defendant should be clear and strong, he could give to that evidence its due weight. The juror was rejected, but the opinion of the bench was excepted to.

THOMAS ROBERTS, as spokesman, says he has formed an opinion, and that opinion continues to the present time; does not know that he has ever expressed it; his opinion was formed from reports, and not from information derived from individuals who were personally acquainted with the circumstances of the case. His opinion was formed, if the common reports were true; he has no bias either for or against Mather; lives in the village of Albion, and boards at the same house with Mather, but has had no conversation with him. Admitted.

ALDERMAN BUTTS sworn as spokesman: has not formed or expressed an opinion, and should have no difficulty in giving due weight to the testimony; has no bias. Admitted.

The Jury was now formed of William Loomis, Simon Gliddon, Jonathan French, Jonathan Follett, Charles Kelly, Luther St. John, Jonathan Whitney, Asahel L. Owen, Rufus Ingersoll, Carlos C. Ashley, Thomas Roberts, and Alderman Butts, and the trial commenced.

[This trial commenced on Wednesday morning the 11th ult., and the jury was not fully made up until about 11 o'clock of Tuesday forenoon, the 17th, nearly a week. The utmost patience of investigation, was manifested by the judge, the jury and the counsel, and the extraordinary importance of the question at issue, seemed to have full weight not only upon those immediately connected with the trial, but upon all who were present. The space we have given up to the preceding report, will be pardoned by our readers, who we doubt not will feel as much interest in the facts elicited during the course of the trial, and the able vindication of the Masonick Institution, which those facts, drawn as they were from the unwilling lips of seceding masons, furnish, as did all who attended the trial. The triumph of the friends of unadulterated truth was complete—the infallible test of a court of justice, has put to flight a thousand shallow slanders which the enemies of freemasonry had, under countenance of a few apostates, heaped up to blacken its good name. We shall probably hear but little more of the irreligion of freemasonry, of the "right or wrong" bug bear, of its interference with the court of justice, &c. We have the solemn oaths, age and legal ones, of the initiated in the anti-masonic ranks, to disprove such libels, and although the wilful wickedness of some of the reckless tools of the faction, may hereafter reiterate them, they will be heard by the unbelieving ears of a people who have abundant and certain testimony to gainsay them.]

SPIRIT OF DISCOVERY.

We copy, this afternoon, a striking article of a Liverpool paper, on the progress of mechanical science and invention. Our own imagination has been so stimulated by the recent trial in Liverpool of the Locomotive Carriers, than on the march of the Russians over the Balkan, or the capitulation of the Sublime Porte. The fact of a decrepit empire, or the substitution of masters for certain tracts of Europe or Asia, may be deemed insignificant, when compared with the probable results of the marvellous contraction of time and space, and the increased facility and security of the intercourse of enlightened mind and peaceful industry, by which every real object of human enjoyment and welfare may be immediately promoted. We have before us, in the Liverpool Mechanics' Magazine, an engraving of The Novelty, the steam-carriage that "flung at the rate of nearly two miles in three minutes" as smoothly as a skater on the smoothest ice. A simple inspection at once satisfies the enquirer that it has not been extravagantly extolled for its singular lightness, compactness and elegance. All the engines of the kind, before constructed, required a separate tender to carry the water and fuel necessary for their operations; but this includes within itself every necessary accommodation, and is nevertheless much lighter than any engine on the old plan. The reduction in weight is pronounced to be of great advantage; yet even in the Novelty the limit has not been reached beyond which there is nothing to be gained by lessening the weight. [National Gazette.]

From the Liverpool Times, of October 20.

THE TRIUMPHS OF SCIENCE AND ART.

Whether the caricatures which represent a steam engine as flying like a balloon through the air, shall ever become anything more than a caricature, may be doubted; but such have been the achievements of science and art within the last three quarters of a century, that it is really difficult to fix any limits to their future conquests. To justify us in pronouncing anything impossible in machines, it ought to be in opposition to some law of nature, and not merely requiring an immense extent or difficult application of power. And so marvellous have been the inventions and discoveries in every branch of science, and in all the arts, since the beginning of the last reign, that, if they had been predicted in the year 1760, most men would have thought the prophcy deserved to rank with the Arabian story of the erection of Aladdin's palace in a single night.

When the pack horse with his bell was the only means of conveying merchandise through the land, and when the carrier conducted his string of horses along tracks always made to pass over the summit of the very highest hills, the vision of a modern mail coach glancing through the valleys, on roads nearly as smooth and level as a bowling-green, and conveying goods and passengers at the rate of eleven or twelve miles an hour, would have been regarded as the work of some supernatural beings, not clogged with the encumbrance of mortal clay. A man who should then have imagined that a distance of four hundred miles could have been performed by a carriage in forty hours, without difficulty or danger, would have been thought worthy of a place amongst the philosophers of Lupa.

A spinner at his wheel, twisting and twirling the livelong day to make some paltry hanks of yarn, would have gazed at the interior of a modern spinning mill—where thousands of spindles are whirled with incredible velocity, moved by no power visible to the spectator—with a superstitious conviction that the whole was the work of unblest powers. To tell him that the force which moved the mighty apparatus of the factory was earthly, yet that it was neither the force of men nor horses, neither the strength of a torrent nor the piping winds of heaven, but nothing more nor less than the steam of boiling water, would only have excited his indignation at the boldness of the imposture which it was attempted to palm upon him.

To show to one of those disorderly persons who return from taverns after the hour of curfew, and who of old were wont to grope through the Egyptian darkness of our streets to their own houses, the splendidly illuminated streets of London or Liverpool, he would be blinded with excess of light, and fancy himself in the hall of Pandemonium, lit up "by subtle magic" with blazing cressets of naphtha and asphalt. If he could understand that these brilliant stars of light proceeded from an invisible vapour which circulated for miles under the streets, he would be only the more perfectly convinced that he had gone prematurely into the lower world.

Since the invention of printing, the power of man to disseminate knowledge has been increased almost beyond calculation. Even within the last thirty years a prodigious augmentation has taken place in this power. Before the improvement of Earl Stanhope, from three to four hundred sheets might be printed per hour at the press; but the steam-press which now works the Times newspaper, prints four thousand sheets per hour; or more than a sheet per second! It may be easily proved that to write by hand the number of newspapers circulated by the Times, daily, would require a million and half scribes; yet they are printed with ease by about two dozen men. Such is the effect of a skilful division of labour, that a debate of 8 or 10 hours duration in the House of Commons may be fully and ably reported, printed and published so as to be read in London within three or four hours after its termination, and at sixty miles from the Metropolis, before the speakers of the previous night have risen from their beds.

In navigation, as in printing, invention slumbered for centuries, and then suddenly awoke in the wondrous steam-vessel. Steam navigation is probably yet in its infancy, yet it has already effected an astonishing extension of intercourse between all parts of the British Isles, the widely separated towns and territories of the United States, and several of the countries of Europe. It was not uncommon a dozen years ago to wait in this port for days and even weeks by calm or adverse winds. By the steam-packets we pass easily and with certainty in a single night from Liverpool to Dublin; and they operate as bridges connecting the sister island with England. Calms do not retard their flight over the waves; adverse tides and winds, though they somewhat impede, cannot arrest their progress. Instinct with power, "they walk the waters like a thing of life." By their aid the voyage to India will probably be made, ere many more years have elapsed, scarcely a more formidable thing than a journey from London to Scotland was a century ago.

Such are a few of the striking inventions and improvements of modern times. Yet invention is not exhausted. These seem to be but the commencement of an endless series; and the late experiments of locomotive carriages on our railway give us quite a new idea of what science and art may yet do to quicken the transport of travellers and goods through our land. Though the idea of moving a carriage by mechanical power within it, is not absolutely new, yet it has never been successfully reduced to practice till our own day: animate power, applied either externally or internally, has always been used for the purpose of locomotion. To place a steam engine on wheels, and to make it move both itself and an additional weight, was a bold conception: the first essays were clumsy and unpromising, and even up to the present time a machine has never been seen in operation which was calculated for the rapid conveyance either of passengers or commodities.

The performance of the Rocket and the Novelty give a sudden spur to our drowsy imaginations, and make our ideas fly as fast as the machines themselves. These engines with all their apparatus skim over the earth at more than double the speed of the lightest and fastest mail, drawn by the swiftest blood horses, and driven by the most desperate coachman, over the smoothest roads of England. Upwards of thirty miles an hour! Let us see—at this rate we reach Manchester in an hour, Birmingham in three hours, London, Edinburgh or Glasgow in six hours, and you may glide along at this bird-like speed with as little discomfort as if you were sitting in your arm chair, reading a volume of the Diamond Poets, without being disturbed by a single joint, nay, I believe it would not be difficult to write. If the length of the journey made it worth while, I should expect to see rail road coaches fitted up with libraries and escrutoirs; but it will soon be nearly useless to take up a book for so short a journey as one or two hundred miles.

But if a speed of thirty miles an hour has already been attained, what good reason is there that we should not in process of time accomplish sixty miles per hour? Nay, why should we stop there? I am not bold enough to anticipate the time when coaches will supersede the telegraph, but I may reasonably expect to see them leaving the carrier pigeon behind.

On a well constructed railway, like that between Liverpool and Manchester, there is less danger in moving at the rate of thirty miles per hour than there is in travelling at the rate of ten miles an hour on a turnpike road. On the rail way there is not a single turn and scarcely a single inequality; in these respects the engineer has boldly and wisely aimed at perfection, though he thereby incurred what many deemed an extravagant expense. The chief sources of danger in travelling rapidly on turnpike roads are—1st hills; 2d, turnings in the road; 3d, inequalities in the surface of the road; 4th, unruly horses; 5th, meeting other horses. Not one of these dangers exists on the railway, and therefore it is difficult to limit the speed at which we may travel with safety.

I have chosen a fertile theme, and must leave it unexhausted. It may afford me ample room for future speculations. E.

HISTORICAL.

THE MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

But to return; after the banishment of Iturbide the government was occasionally disturbed by tumultuary movements, such as that of Lobato in 1824, of Andrade, Quintana, and others in the same year, and by the return of the ex-emperor himself on the 8th of July, almost immediately after the defeat of his partisans, just named. He was conducted on the 16th of the same month to Padilla, in the state of Tamaulipas, identified before the Congress, and in three hours afterwards shot. The real story is, we believe, little known in Europe. It is this: Garza, whose life had been spared by Iturbide, as we have already stated, had been the medium of communication between him and his friends in the Northern States. Whether he had become so with the intent to betray him, or was led to do so by the failure of the rising under Quintana, we cannot pretend to decide; but thus much appears certain, that Beneski, a Polish adventurer, who accompanied Iturbide, had conferences with him (Garza,) under some plausible pretext. Iturbide landed in disguise, as Garza states in his official report, but as we have been assured on good authority, on the invitation of that officer to put himself at the head of the troops and lead them to redress the wrongs of his country. That Iturbide acted under this conviction is to our minds certain, for we are sure, that with his resolution of character he would never have submitted to be led to Padilla like a bull to the stake. He entered Padilla with the assurance of a victorious chief, but death in a few hours dispelled the illusion. Every fact that has come to our knowledge respecting his last moments is confirmatory of this, and he died as he lived, bold and undaunted. It is impossible to reconcile this atrocious act of the Mexican authorities with the commonest principles of justice. It has indeed been attempted to defend it, on the ground that as he was outlawed, it was allowable to hunt him down like a wild beast. Let us look to facts. On the 23th of April, 1824, the Congress, labouring under the apprehension of his invading the country, pronounced his outlawry. He sailed from Southampton on the 11th May, so that he could not by any possibility know of the decree, and he arrived at Soto de la Marina on the 8th of July, without having touched at any place on his voyage.

In 1827, there were insurrections in various parts of the north, and even in the capital. The last and the present years have been distinguished by the proceedings of Bravo, Barragon, Santana, and Guerrero; the two last have effected an entire revolution of men, if not of principles, which, if peace and unanimity be not established at home, may soon give place to other changes, brought into action by the now (we apprehend seriously) threatened Spanish invasion from Cuba, at the expense of the Cadiz merchants. That the Spanish domination has passed away for ever, cannot be soberly doubted; but with such materials as exist in Mexico, any hostile force on the coasts might rekindle furious animosities, that would require the soothing influence of many years to allay.

A very few words may suffice respecting the existing government of Mexico. As we have already seen, the federal form of republic has been chosen, and the constitution of the United States adopted as the model. The legislature consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. A president and vice-president are elected for four years, and the former is ineligible for re-election for four years more. The powers of the president are very considerable. Provision is made for the exercise of the legislative and judicial functions in detail. The government of each state depends on the particular constitution which it has adopted. This, however, must be in conformity with certain general principles recognised by the central congress, and must not be in opposition to the general constitution. For a fuller account of the latter, we cannot do better than refer to Mr. Ward's work, which contains the only details of it we have yet seen, distinct from the original constitution of the several states and the acts of congress.

Victoria* and Bravo were the first elected to fill the office of president and vice-president. The latter was banished last year for some revolutionary attempt; Gomez Peuraza was chosen to succeed Victoria, and Guerrero to fill the vice-presidential chair. This was resented by the mulatto chief, and after a severe struggle, commenced by the incessant intriguer Santana, Pedraza has been expelled, and Guerrero chosen in his stead. It has been said that since the ascendancy of Guerrero, the aspect of affairs has become more settled. This is possible, for Guerrero, though a semi-barbarian, is a man of firmness and strong natural talents, and possesses the confidence of the majority, being one of themselves. Besides which, his continued hostility to Spain throughout the struggle for independence has acquired for him the reputation of its most devoted defender. He is, however, grossly ignorant, incapable, we believe, of reading any writing but his own griffonage, and excessively obstinate. Every thing will depend on the selection of his advisers; if he happen to take a right course, his pertinacity will be useless; if, on the contrary, he should be wrong, the mischief will be irreparable. The scenes that preceded his election in the capital itself have afforded but small hopes of a moderate administration. The sacking of the first city in the republic, the butchery of its peaceful inhabitants under the eye of the then president, and the range given to the licentiousness of the military, open but a melancholy prospect, and afford but small encouragement for the realization of the splendid anticipations which so many have entertained. Let us hope, however, now that personal ambition has been gratified, that a sense of the true interests of his country will influence the new president and direct his councils.

It was a favourite opinion with many, that it was only necessary for Mexico to throw off the Spanish yoke, in order that she might enter the lists of improvement with the United States of America. The advocates of this opinion, even to a modified extent, appear to have overlooked some most important considerations; on the one hand they forget that Mexico was a degraded colony of degraded Spain—that its inhabitants were plunged into a state of extreme moral darkness—that, in fact, they were what Lemaire, the gallant defender of San Juan de Ullon, designated them, "hijos malcriados de los malos Espanoles" (ill-bred sons of bad Spaniards);—that, on the other hand, the founders of the United States were Englishmen, who carried the liberal spirit and enlightened institutions of their father-land with them across the Atlantick; and all that they had to do, after shaking off the yoke of England, was to govern themselves in the way best fitted to their local interests. The Mexican, however, has not only to throw off his allegiance to Spain, but to divest himself of all the miserable institutions, habits, customs, and propensities entailed upon him by his parentage. He has to effect not only a political, but a moral regeneration; and with the most ardent hopes for his success, we cannot discard from our minds the impression that such a regeneration can only be the result of time and experience, and not of a mere change of name or of master. Society in Mexico is evidently in a disorganized state at present, and the prosperity of the people must necessarily sympathize with it. Agriculture cannot be very vigorously pursued, while the husbandman is uncertain of reaping his harvest in security. Commerce must be limited, so long as the wants of the consumer are small, and his means still smaller; and the violent expulsion of the most intelligent and wealthy individuals in the republic, although it may gratify vindictive feelings, must at the same time weaken the confidence of foreigners in the wisdom of the government, and disincline them to expose their property to the risk of similar measures. The physical configuration of Mexico also obstructs her rapid progress, although it affords a strong guarantee of her independence. A nation far behind most of its contemporaries cannot be made sensible of its defects without a comparison with others. The great bulk of the Mexicans, from the unhealthiness of the coasts, crowd to the central plains, to which the distance precludes few but resident foreigners from penetrating; hence their intercourse with the natives is restricted, and the improvement arising from intercourse and collision with them necessarily checked. Added to all these disadvantages, it must be confessed that the course of policy pursued by the government from the establishment of independence up to the present moment, has been, with few exceptions, of a kind neither fitted to inspire its own subjects with confidence and attachment, nor to command the respect of foreign powers. Unless the present rulers show a determination to use the power they have acquired by such doubtful means for purposes of acknowledged public benefit—for the security of persons and property by a strict administration of justice—for the honest, however tardy, fulfilment of engagements for which the national faith has been pledged, and for laying the foundation of a system of popular education—unless, we say, they do this, their reign, we hazard nothing in predicting, will be of very short duration. In the hope, however faint, that such may be their dispositions, we now close these cursory observations.

SAXON NAMES OF THE MONTHS.

December, which stood first, was styled "Mid-winter monath." January was "Aelter-yula," or after Christmas. February "Sol monath," from the returning sun. March "Rhede, or Rhede monath," rough, or rugged month. April "Easter monath," from a favourite Saxon goddess, whose name we still preserve. May was "Trimichi," from the cows being then milked thrice in the day. June "Sere monath," dry month. July "Mæd monath," the meads being then in their bloom. August was "Weod monath," from the luxuriance of weeds. September "Harfest monath." October they called "Winter fylleth," from winter approaching with the full moon of that month. And lastly, November was styled "Blot monath," from the blood of the cattle slain that month, and stored for winter provision. Verstegan names the months somewhat differently.

Louis XIV. was presented with an epitaph by an indifferent poet, on the celebrated Moliere. "I would to God," said he, "that Moliere had brought me yours."

* Victoria, whom we have already mentioned as Don Joro Maria Pagan, ex, was much distinguished during the revolutionary contest. He joined Madero, and afterwards, it is said, associated himself with the Conde de St. Jago's coachman, who headed a predatory party on the plains of Arana. He was driven from thence, and occupied the fortress of Vera Cruz, during which he either guided, or forced the Frenches of Vera Cruz, some advantage over the royalists on the 12th of December, a day dedicated to Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe, the patroness of Mexico, and to commemorate the triumph, as well as to do honour to the Virgin, he adorned his titles, styles, and designation, and adopted that of Guadalupe Victoria, honoured the saint, by making the 12th of December his own natal day. Such absurdities excited admiration in Mexico, and Victoria is there deemed a hero.

THE LEGENDARY.

From the New England Weekly Review.

THE GOBLIN OAK.

The events of which we speak, happened since the establishment of Common Schools, and near one of those villages now so beautifully scattered over the banks of our own Connecticut. The dark days of the Revolution had passed away, with all their long train of clouds and storms. The blood of the Patriot had sunk into the ground, and no longer cried for freedom or vengeance—both were won—the smoke of the battle-field had ascended to Heaven, and the warm beams of the sun of Peace burst through summer skies, bearing in their course life and light and joy.

Jacob Snell had been an industrious, economical, and thriving man. He began the world without friends or money—but he had what neither can bestow, stout hands and a stout heart; and, at the end of ten years from his first "setting up," he found himself the undisputed master of a small house, land enough to keep him from idleness, a wife, and four fat, chubby children. At this time, when Jacob's luck was all "right side out," as he used to say, and the future promised to crown the expectations of his youth with fulness, one of his playmates, who had been wandering up and down in the world, homeless and houseless as a bird of passage, for many long years until the scenes of his youth had forgotten him, returned to his native village, and set up a Store in Jacob's neighbourhood. Sundry rolls of green and red cloth in one window, a collection of snuff jars and bottles in the other, and more especially a broad black board, with white letters, over the door, indicated to all the passers-by that European and West India Goods were for sale in that place by Mr. Solomon Swap. As it was something less than a mile from his house, Jacob soon called to renew his acquaintance, and, to his very great surprise, found, that Swap had grown from a green, white-headed, monkey-looking imp to be one of the most pleasant and polite men in the world. He shook Jacob most heartily by the hand, invited him into the back shop, where a good fire helped counteract the effects of the Autumn wind, made a thousand enquiries about days long syne, told some of his own adventures, and, to close the whole, presented for Jacob's acceptance a streaming bowl of flip well seasoned, and of especial flavour. Ill humour and low spirits were no part of Jacob Snell's composition, and, upon this occasion, his good nature broke over all bounds. He returned home in great glee, and laughed, whistled, and sung songs the whole evening.

Swap and his store did not easily fade from Jacob's memory. But a few days had elapsed, before it occurred to him, that it would be well enough to call and enquire of the merchant what he allowed for pork in exchange for goods—not that he intended to dispose of his fat hogs in this way—but then it would do no harm to just put the question. He was greeted with the same saucy and the same beverage as before, and the interview closed with his bargaining every ounce of his pork to Swap, who, in return, was to let him have goods very low—very low indeed. The ice was now fairly broken, and Jacob repeated his visits and his potations so often, that, before winter closed, an evening at home became dull and almost intolerable. He now found, that he wanted a great many articles, which could be had at the "Store"—and, most unfortunately, among other things he wanted companions and grog. The vices are more closely allied than the virtues. Raise but one devil your self, and that fiend will call up a legion of his associates. Jacob, from drunkenness, went forward to gaming—and the natural consequences ensued. The subtraction from his labours and the addition to his expenses soon wrought a fearful balance against his prosperity. He went from his house dejected and unhappy—he returned dejected, unhappy, and—drunk. Only one bright gleam shone through the clouds that gathered over his path, and that came from the windows of Swap's back shop. It was the only star in Jacob's benighted Heaven—and that, he knew, he felt, was luring him down to the chambers of death. In that wretched apartment, amid the lowest, the vilest of the vine, surrounded with cards, dice, flip, broken bottles, and the fumes of tobacco, he strove with desperate energy to crush the worm gnawing at his vitals.

Two years rolled away. "I would not go down to Sol Swap's store to night, if I was you, Jacob," said his wife, as she saw him fumbling behind the door for a ragged great coat. "I would," replied Jacob. "I should be ashamed to be sitting up there every night playing too and drinking flip, while my children were crying for bread, at home." "Peg!" said he, "if you want to wear the breeches so much, you may have the old ones, up stairs." "You know better, Jacob Snell, and you won't have breeches or any thing else to wear long, if you don't turn over a new leaf." "You mind your own business, wife—if they are ragged, mend 'em—that's your look out." "Don't go down there to carry on with that gang, Jacob—don't." "I will," exclaimed Jacob, in a voice of thunder, with an oath we dare not repeat; "I will go, if the devil himself stands in the way"—and, so saying, he sallied forth, slamming the door with a force that made his dwelling shake to its foundations.

It was an evening in November—a damp, cloudy and chilly evening—one of those so common to the season in New England, and from which the weatherwise may prognosticate a fair or foul morrow with about equal probability. The winds were apparently hushed, for the few remaining leaves slept quietly on the forest boughs, but the clouds indicated a strong, quick current above, and heavy masses rolled rapidly through the sky, leaving the place of the risen moon visible only at intervals. The light was consequently variable. Sometimes a sudden brightening up would reach the distant hills, and tempt you to look in vain for the shadows around you—again the gloom would deepen, and you might almost see the darkness, like a tempest cloud rushing toward you from the horizon. But Jacob Snell had thought little of these matters. With a body enfeebled by late hours and strong drink; and a mind stupefied and poisoned with drunkenness and gambling; his thoughts were wandering over past scenes of riot at Sol Swap's store, and if the future ever pressed upon his vision, he closed his eyes in horror, for the poor house, the jail was there. He passed along his solitary way in silence, until the path, in winding around a hill, led him to a little dell of perhaps a bow-shot across. In this place, at the lowest point of descent, by the road side, arose a large oak tree; that flung its long arms across the way, and some of them so near the earth as to be easily reached by the hand. Near by, stood the school house, and many a bright summer day had the noisy urchins clambered among these low branches, swinging and joying in the balmy air, as careless and free as the birds that carolled above their heads. By them it was known as "the old oak." It was now almost leafless—but a few scattered leaves clung here and there to the gnarled boughs, and bade defiance, even in desolation, to tempest and storm. As Jacob approached this tree a rustling in its branches caught his ear, and he looked up. There was a man apparently seated on one of the highest limbs over the highway. "Hullo, Sam!" said Jacob, "that you?" and, stooping down, he gathered a handful of pebbles, and began throwing them playfully at his supposed neighbour, calling upon him at the same time to come down. The man instantly descended with extraordinary celerity from branch to branch, until he arrived at the lowest where he seated himself with his face turned towards Jacob Snell. Jacob was somewhat inclined to marvel at Sam's expedition in "climbing down," as he called it; and not knowing but he might possibly be deceived, in his supposition, he called out, "who are you?" There was no answer but the echo of Jacob's own voice from the hollow hill. "Come now Sam, you needn't try to scare me"—and, paused for a moment, he added—"for you won't make out." Still there was no answer but the echo, and Jacob determined to take a nearer view, and ascertain, at all hazards, who it was. He advanced hastily, until he might have laid his hand upon the limb where the man was. The light now enabled him to see distinctly, and Jacob Snell gazed—with an earnestness, an ardour, an intenseness, that drew his whole soul to his eyes, he gazed into a countenance turned full upon his own. As he looked, his feet seemed to grow to the earth where he stood, his blood grew chill, his jaws became set, his fingers clenched as if grasping for life, his joints stiffened, his eyes were fixed, and his whole man seemed about to reverse the fable of Pygmalion's statue, and grow to marble. Was it so!—had his dreadful imprecation been thus answered! was he gazing in a looking-glass! for it was the face of Jacob Snell—that countenance was his own! The agony was too much—his stiffened sinews relaxed, his brain chilled, and he fell as dead.

How he got home that night Jacob could never tell—but, when he re-entered his dwelling, he was an altered man. He resumed his industrious economical habits, abandoned grog in all its seductive forms, never visited Sol Swap's store but once and then to pay up his debts, his wife smiled, his children smiled, and peace and plenty smiled upon him during a long and happy life. But the oak—the fatal oak he could never pass, day or night, without an involuntary shudder. He told the story of the eventful evening to no one but his wife, and Peggy always insisted she had kept the secret inviolate—but somehow his tale got whispered among the old grannies of the village, always a secret, a very great and mysterious secret; and, from that day, the Oak, which is yet "strong against a thousand winters" has been known and feared as "THE GOBLIN OAK."

THE DEAD SEA.

"Lugentes campant circa domus domus domus."
—Virg. Æneid. l. vi.

Whoever has spent the month of March at Jerusalem, and knows how to value an ample view from a clean terrace, of one of the most interesting scenes in history, will never forget, unless he be singularly ungrateful, the Latin Convent of our Holy Saviour. March is as clear, fresh and gusty a month here as with us in the North of Europe, and shifts the decoration and colouring of your landscape I know not how often in the same day. This is no evil; Jerusalem is so compendiously packed up within its Turkish walls, that, without some such change, you would soon fall asleep over the monotony. Our grey clouds and pea-green washy-looking landscapes are not more melancholy than an earth burnt up to the rocks, and a blaze of blue sky overhead: now thus you avoid in the month of March; you stand on the confines of two great portions of the year, and have dashes and blendings of both. We all lived below in a dungeon-like room, too large for a cell, but too dreary for a habitable apartment. There was one great window, but its huge bars and cobwebbed panes of yellow-looking glass darkened the little day-light which was left us. Some lumber in the way of a few old creaking chairs under us, and a clumsy back desk, notched with the memorials of the pilgrims who had preceded us, did the part of furniture. I remember, above all, the door. It was like the hieroglyphic tablet in the tomb of some Egyptian king. Names, and some of them worth reading, scarred it all over. On a rainy day it was invaluable. Our servants pitched their tent on one of the terraces outside, and revelled at large on the wine of Bethlehem. But we were careless enough about our in-door comforts. We lived, like all good Easterns, wholly and altogether in the open air. When not actually on excursions, in and round the city, we were to be found on the terrace. That terrace was worth an entire library and garden. It was nothing more than the roof of the building; perfectly flat, well paved, and kept in the best order with a plain parapet, and no interruption but the cupola, rising in the centre, like an isolated little temple, and looking out in various ways upon the most striking features of the city. I read Herodotus at Thermopylae and Marathon, and the Iliad on the plains of Troy, but I would give both for a chapter of Isaiah or Jeremiah from the terrace of the convent of San Salvator. I remember one evening, in particular, it was so wild and wayward, the sky so dull and lurid—I had made up my mind for an earthquake, or a hurricane, or something worse than either, for which I had no distinct name; when, after a pause, in which you could have heard distinctly the whispers of two naked Arabs at their prayers on the terrace near, I saw a great burst of light—half sun, half cloud—with a deep flaring rainbow crowning it, sweep off from behind Mount Olivet towards the Dead Sea. I thought of Julian and St. Cyril, and his crosses, and pronounced him a good observer and a better poet. Jerusalem was starred with the light, and Olivet was as if Shiloh had revealed himself, and the bare red rocks of the Dead Sea seemed angry with the smouldering of the sinking cities, and Tophet (fit scenes for the rites of Moloch) looked doubly dark and sepulchral. These were no unusual accompaniments to our readings; we read and read, and listened and gazed, and then came the winds of the retreating storms over us—and the chant of those Franciscans; and the dull heavy swell of the organ below. This was the poetry of the day—but we had plenty of prose also. The community was composed of the ordinary ingredients: forty monks all sighing for Europe, fearing the Turks, hating the Greeks, and taking any thing per l'amor d'Iddio, were it even a bag of sequins; but withal good-humoured, good-natured, gossips by profession and disposition, and willing to ease any unfortunate traveller of his time and ennui, if properly required. After supper we had every night our conversazione. Our predecessors were discussed, with their merits and demerits—Chateaubriand, I remember, figured toto vertice amongst his contemporaries, but not precisely in the way he would have preferred. The pilgrim cavalier was testy enough, and nearly knocked down a monk for some trifling mistake or inattention. In his own pages he is not less valiant, but then he performs these exploits not on monks, but Turks, which makes all the difference in the world. The monks were soon exhausted, and became bores. We were infinitely obliged, in such a state of our affairs, to a lively Monsieur M——, since a preacher of no ordinary lungs and success in the South of France, for his occasional visits. He was the most kindly-conditioned dialectician I ever met with, and, in controversy, was, what the fancy would call, a perfect "glutton." Theological encounters he would go any distance for, and under texts, which to us looked perfectly flat and uninteresting, he was sure to scent out, as in a fox cover the most admirable quarry. Then M—— was eloquent, or believed himself to be so. He preached; and when he preached, it was with such an extravagant unction, it was impossible not to burst at once into a flagrant laugh. Moods, tenses, languages, were secondary matters to him—when requested, he volunteered, without the least demur, fragments of Spanish or Italian, and pirouetted off at last into French, without the least concern as if he were doing every thing in the most graceful and perfect manner in the world. He was no favourite, we could soon perceive, in the convent. A Frenchman, and a Frenchman in the most teasing and vivid sense of the word, could not find much grace amongst a community of grave Spaniards and Italians. He annoyed the monks, moreover, at their orisons, or in their sleep; for half his nights were spent in striding about (and no man had a more emphatic and ponderous stride) from his room to his gallery, and making portentous preparations for the display of the ensuing morning. Yet was the Abbe M—— a "trouvaille" at Jerusalem, though somewhat of an "ennuyé" in the long run elsewhere; and for having delivered us from the company of his brethren, and sometimes from our own, we owe him a large store of gratitude, and no men can be more willing to pay it, when ever an opportunity will permit.

But we at last got tired of these pleasures, and proposed an excursion to the Dead Sea, and subsequently to Karak and Petra. When at Cairo, we had been recommended to take the route by Jerusalem—now that we found ourselves at Jerusalem people said, what fools not to have gone by Cairo! Had there been any possibility of change or retreat we should, of course, not have heard these observations. The first things we had to think of, were good horses, and then good guides. Any man who has money will easily find the first;—the latter are not to be dug up on every occasion. We made inquiries every where. Some asked us, "where Karak was?" and others said, "It is somewhere in Mesopotamia." The Turks shook their heads and continued smoking; the Greeks, finding we patronized the Latin convent, left us to our own bad taste and evil fate. In this dilemma, the Padre Guardiano, as the Superior was called, came to us one morning with his face all radiant with joy, full of glee and mystery, and informed us, much to our satisfaction, that he had found a person of confidence, who had another person of confidence, who knew every thing, and who would do every thing—in a word, in whom we also might implicitly confide. The intermediate had been tried and found proof; and had, at this time, a great veneration for the English. He was a Sheikh, and was possessed of a tribe counting from two to three hundred men. We, who had not less veneration for Sheikhs than he had for Englishmen, and believed in the honesty of all Bedouins, on the faith of numerous extracts from the best writers in our note books, were delighted beyond measure at our good fortune. The Padre offered his snuff-box by way of congratulation, and in parting said, "You need not fear this man: he is under the deepest obligation to Mr. B——; he saved him from the gallows and his son from prison; now it is out of the nature of things he can be ungrateful." We thought so too; but it is not the first time we had been deceived by the nature of things; besides, we were some years younger than the good Padre. Time, however, who discovers all things, somewhat shook the soundness of these conclusions.

A few days afterwards, this gentleman-freebooter was introduced to us in proper form. He looked just such a man as must have been saved six or seven times from the gallows, and whose life was charmed henceforth against all chance of the executioner. I have the infidel's face before me still. Sheikh Mohammed was a wizened, withered, bony, sinister-looking man: his features dried up by sun and wind into a black, mummy-seeming substance, fiercely lighted by two glistening crab-like eyes; his teeth deathly white, and his hair as black as charcoal, and coarse knots and flakes. All this was half hid by his black bedouin shawl and beard. The shawl was most unsheiklike; rent and dirty, he seemed now to have carried it about him for many years—a legacy, I suppose, or intended to be one. The smile of this man was worse than his frown; there was treachery and suspicion mixed. He spoke little; but when he did, he gave out the Arab guttural with an importunate emphasis, which had not the illusion been strongly at work upon us, would probably have set us on our guard. But we had the word of the Guardiano, and, what is not unusual with young travellers, a superabundance of good faith. Mohammed, with all his external drawbacks—and no man bore a plainer advertisement of the interior man on his brow—was taken at once into our unlimited confidence.

On our arrival at Jerusalem, we had found two of our countrymen in the next cell to our own; one extremely ill of a fever, the other scarcely less so of the country; both anxious to get back to Europe, and both rejoiced at some prospect of relief from the monotonous consolations of the fraternity. The latter, seduced by our conversation, numbers, or cook, was induced once more to risk his fortunes on the waters. He was the best tempered careless lounge of a traveller I had ever chanced to meet withal—an utter Irishman, never thinking to-day of the evils of to-morrow; if ever in a passion, the next moment out of it; but to all the serious purposes of travelling, a perfect stranger; guiltless of all research or observation; counting his steps by his dinners, and taking especial note of the bad ones; but then never recollecting the "notabilia" of a place, until past all chance or means of examining them. At Tyre, where the plague compelled us to camp, at a little distance from the town, in the sands, he seriously proposed ending in our cold mutton to be broiled in the very midst of the pestiferes. At times, however, he was not without a proper sense of danger. At Rosetta he had to pass from one end of the town to the other during the prevalence of a similar visitation; he would not trust to the discretion of his Janizary, but drew his sabre, and thus made himself a sort of cordon sanitaire, as he termed it, through the crowd. With this gentleman, (and he was something more, for he had served non sine gloria in the Peninsula.) we started, on the 5th of April, for the Dead Sea; and after crossing Olivet to the small village of Bethany, entered on a wild mountainous district, which continues nearly uninterrupted to Jericho.

Our road, for a considerable time, lay along a broken and stony narrow pathway, by the edge of a deep ravine. We passed Hodel Lazariah, and successively Wadi Mounah and Tarbors El Hamid. The mountains in this vicinity are round and separate, thinly sprinkled with olives; and here and there stretches of rich pasturage gleaming through their sheltered defiles. On leaving El Hamid, we got gradually into a much bolder character of country, and stood, after a slight ascent towards the north over the dead and gloomy glen called El Gibz. We dismounted, and sat on a ledge of the rock which looked over the abyss. It was a scene of most appalling grandeur. Great horizontal strata lay confusedly tumbled together, as if torn violently by the broad palm of some supernatural being, and hurled asunder to set the twinkled torrent loose below. There were no trees, and very little vegetation; no traces of living thing except the caves, sepulchres, or cells, hewn out, at an immense height, in the gloomy amphitheatre of perpendicular rocks which stretched overhead. After passing this ravine, we descended through a succession of lower hills and valleys, in one of which tradition has placed the valley of Adummin, to a mountain point, the last in the rocky chain. From this commanding position we had a most extensive view of the plains of Jericho and the mountains of Moab. The plain of a dead, sombre green, though tradition and poetry flush it with a thousand colours: the roses of Jericho are predominant in all our associations. The town, to which the eye is guided by some bright tracts of trees, seems compressed, at this distance, into a single tower; and the Jordan, seen only at intervals, or rather its banks, goes sullenly and muddily along through an arid and gloomy flat. Moab looks lofty and proud; her mountains, broken into a variety of minute conical forms, run along, a bold iron barrier to the unconquered land. In getting into the plain, we stood immediately opposite the "Quarantina;" the quaint appellation of the rock where Christ is supposed to have suffered his fast of forty days. The mountain looks one of the most prominent and lofty of the chain, and appears broken into three distinct summits. Thanks to its legendary reputation, it seems once to have been thickly peopled by a host of monks. Its face is steep, bare, and boldly trencched with the traces of torrents, and other marks of convulsion and change. On the highest point stands the chapel; and half way up are visible two lines of very regular excavation, cells, &c. remains of the former habitations of the monks. The plain extends along its base, and beyond or many miles east and west; and whether in relation to the desert behind, or the rich tract before, the position has been fixed on with more propriety and consistency than is usual in these matters. The Arabs, as is customary, levied formerly large profits on the zeal of the pilgrim; but when we were there, we found that some stronger hand had interposed, and they had momentarily been dispossessed. We looked and would have taken the trouble to climb, had the day been longer, or our piety and curiosity not yielded to our fatigue. After tasting a fountain which goes under the name of Elijah, and which we found rather more mawkish than we could have desired, we trotted on over some swampy ground to the Aga's house, which formerly, as our guide told us, belonged to Zaccheus. His tree was there shown to us; and though we could find no sycamores in or near the place, we were not disposed to find fault. A little after, we had the consolation of beholding the ragged village of Raba, and were informed it was the legitimate successor to the celebrated city of Jericho. It must with sorrow be admitted that it has somewhat degenerated from the glory and prosperity of its ancestor; for instead of walls which defied an army, and a town which was capable of containing one, we saw an irregular group of about 10 or 14 houses, (but of stone and not of mud,) put any how together, and covered comme Dieu veut, with the first stuff which fortune had thrown in their way. Gird this strong place with a hedge of dry or withered wood for walls, and for a gate erect two posts, with a third laid across it, (and these as rickety as you please,) and you will then have modern Jericho, and something better perhaps, after all, than the naked reality. Encamped on a dusty esplanade before the Sheikh's house, (for there is a Sheikh, as well as Aga, even at Raha,) in company with his cattle, we dined, resignedly, on indifferent eggs, sour milk, and goats' cheese. Our military companion, who had high ideas of the talents of our cook, (a Greek artiste, who excelled at a Dulma,) was sorely grieved at this disappointment. He stared, and then railed; but this did not alter the matter, nor prevent us from sleeping well, and cheerfully setting out the next morning for our destination.

The Aga was an important man at Raha, and was fond of doing things in a creditable manner; so, notwithstanding our humility, he insisted on our taking his whole Bedouin garrison—by way, we have since thought, of a garde d'honneur, for protection it would have afforded none. This is the consequence of being on terms with great people. It was the Governor of Jerusalem's letter which involved us in all these courtesies; he sees his friends as he ought, and quarters his own retainers on his friends as he ought also, both no unusual practices in the etiquette or civility of the East. The trifling symptoms of industry round Jericho soon ceased; we entered on a barren plain, slimy, and studded up and down with patches of shrubs, heath, hyssop, anemones, &c. succeeded by salt sands, and pools, and rye grass, and rushes, in rank abundance. A little after we had reached this open tract, our Bedouins, taking advantage of the ground, suddenly burst out into an extravagant display of their Arab horsemanship. They galloped up with loud challenges to their adversary, tossing their gun in the air, or stretching it out triumphantly in one hand; then they fled at full speed, and then again as quickly returned, aiming directly at their antagonist, who, as he received the blow, suddenly shouted and fell back upon his horse, as if he had received a mortal wound. This exhibition was frequently repeated, and generally in pairs. Their guns are long and awkward, slung carelessly behind their backs. All this was accompanied with cheers, and shrieks, and chants. One of these songs was in praise of Bonaparte. It was a monotonous, high-pitched strain, made up principally of the repetition of his name:—

"Bonaparte! Bonaparte!
He is our father and our brother—
He has given us bread, he has given us salt;—
Bonaparte! Bonaparte!" &c.

They were men astonished at the intelligence of his exile, &c. and shook their heads doubtfully, and seemed to say in their own way, "Cela merite confirmation;" we could not have surprised them more had we given them a narrative of the capture of Constantinople. Military glory covers, with these people, an infinity of objections; and the recollection of Napoleon's Syrian and Egyptian campaigns had wiped out all the stains of his Christian creed. The religion of a conqueror cannot be considered very much in the wrong by a fatalist. Besides, the French Republican was not very nice in his selection. It was a mere chance which prevented him from seating himself on the throne of the East.* The son of the Sheikh, a noisy boy of about fourteen years of age, signalized himself amongst these joyous marauders. He was as dirty, weather-worn, and hungry-looking, as the rest. We had now passed some low hills, horizontally stratified, which go under the name of Gebel Shinal. They have much the appearance of ruined fortifications, and bear a strong resemblance

* Bonaparte would have marched to Damascus, and proclaimed himself Emperor of the East, had it not been for the letter of his brother Lucien. Bonaparte and his troops were prepared, and the people anxious to receive him. The return to Europe was attributed to Sir Sidney Smith's gallant defence of Acre; but the cause lay far deeper. Napoleon did not choose to reject his choice long afterwards. But the secret history of this event, like many others in his wonderful career, is as yet unknown to the public. A day may come when they may be fully developed. It is amusing, in the interval, to see the great variety of conjectures which are put forward for true history.

to the general character of the mountains in Egypt. Amongst them is a ruin called the Jew's Castle; we thought it too near the river for Galgal. On our leaving this spot, we came down on what may be termed the first banks of the Jordan.† It was a gentle descent into a marshy piece of ground, marked up and down with a few starved trees. There, at last, we stood gazing on the sacred river itself. Our whole host halted, and dismounted. Two of our Arabs girding themselves, instantly plunged in, and swam across. One of our party followed: the water was cold, and the torrent strong. We sat down for a few moments to enjoy the scene. It is a pleasing spot. The river makes a short turn to the west, and then flows on due south. A small island, formed probably by the trunks of trees, &c. some of which we saw rushing down with the recent rains, cleaves the stream in two. We found the waters of a lurid olive, extremely rapid and eddying; the bottom a fine chalky soil, easily disturbed, and easily subsiding. In summer, the river is quite clear. The Arab who crossed was obliged to swim about one-third of the way: the stream was much swollen; at other times of the year, particularly during the hot months, it is easily fordable on foot. The banks on the west side are precipitous, on the opposite much broken by trees, &c.: their general height about fifteen or twenty feet; their breadth about one hundred and fifty feet, and depth about twelve. A little lower down, the river altogether loses this character. It is still confined by high banks, but they are quite bare both of trees and herbage: the river assumes a dead dim hue; a few scattered reeds are almost sufficient to impede its course, which is remarkably sluggish, and may remind the traveller of some parts of the Tyber.

Remainder next week.

† The plain of Jericho was subject in all times to these periodical floods. "For Jordan overfloweth all his banks in the time of harvest." Joshua, c. iii. v. 15. The salt observed may be attributed to these overflows, and the influence of the waters of the Dead Sea. The tords appear to have been formerly very near in the same places at present. Joshua, c. ii. v. 7. The plain of Jericho, however, was then much better cultivated: flax was one of its productions;—c. ii. v. 6. The desert was a synonymous only with the rocky tract behind. It was generally called the "mountain;"—c. ii. v. 22.

THE GATHERER.

MEASURING FOR A SUPPER.

A tall, raw boned, broad backed fellow, of no very prepossessing appearance, stopped a while ago at one of the Hotels in Boston, and asked for supper. Schaffer, the famous dancing master, who, we are told, is one of the greatest wags in the country, being present, Boniface tipped him the wink to assume pro tem, the duties of landlord. Schaffer, putting on such an air of importance as became the master of the house, told the stranger he could have supper, and desired to know what he would choose. "Sausages," replied the other. "Very well, sir," said the temporary landlord, stepping up to him, "I'll take your measure, if you please." "My measure!" ejaculated the stranger, and began to draw back. "Yes, sir," continued the wag, "we always take the measure of people before we get them a meal of victuals." "What! measure a man for a meal of victuals, the same as you would for a coat or pair of trousers! By jingo! that beats me, I tell ye." Then surveying his stout frame with a rueful expression of countenance, he concluded not to take supper, but content himself with a couple of crackers and a glass of cider. "O, very well, sir," said the lover of fun; and the man having despatched the crackers, and sent the cider after them, asked if he could have a bed. "I'll see, presently," said the counterfeited landlord, and casting his eye busily over a slate that hung in the bar, he resumed, "Yes, sir," we can accommodate you—we have one bed that has but eleven in it." "Eleven in it!" said the fellow, his eyes glaring with renewed astonishment. "Yes, sir," replied the merciless wag. "What! eleven in one bed, and more to be stowed in yet! By hoky! I should like to know how they sleep in Bostown." "Well, you shall soon have an opportunity of trying it. Here, Thomas, light this gentleman to bed, in No. 1340." "Stop, stop Mister! I say, landlord, I should like to know first how we are to lie, so many in a bed?" "O, there's no difficulty, at all, sir; we pile them up in layers, four lengthwise, and then four crosswise, and then the same number lengthwise again, and so on till we get the bed full." "Is that the way you fix 'em! then by the holy spoon!" (waking towards the door) "you don't catch me to stay in Bostown this night—I know!" [N. Y. Constellation.

HOBSON'S CHOICE.

Married, in Aintree, Colonel Darlus Hobson, of the U. S. army, to Miss Charlotte Mackawis, of the Jumping Rabbit, a belle of the Chickasaw tribe. [Bost. Palladium.

We believe we received the first intelligence of this interesting marriage, as we happened to announce it some weeks ago, with a few trifling variations in the orthography of the name of the above mentioned celebrated belle sauvage. We now regret (seeing it has made such a sensation about the country) that we did not then publish our correspondent's letter, in which the information was transmitted us. The description which he gave of the wedding is quite a bijou. The only ceremony performed, was that of each of the parties cutting a tremendous caper over a long livery pole, probably in imitation of the old English custom of jumping over a broomstick. The paternal benediction was then given by an ancient chief, called Tee Hee O-lah, or Stick in the Mud, which was no other than bestowing a coupling spank with the palm of his hand on the rear. Then having saluted the lovely bride by pinching her nose three times, and the bridegroom by giving him a hearty poke in the ribs, he turned them over to Cha Squee Squee, or the Blue Snake, who scratched his head seven times, and pronounced them man and wife.

The nuptials were graced by the presence of the most celebrated chiefs of the tribe. There was the Jumping Sturgeon, Big Rattler, Deer in the Water, Little Devil, Black Duck, Smoking Thumper, White Eyes and Laugh at Mosh. We remember to have read speeches from most of these gentlemen in the Cherokee Phoenix.

A grand dinner was given on the occasion by Hoo Hoo La Fa, or Tickle-Me-Quickly. "All the delicacies of the season" were served up in ample profusion; these consisted of barbecued monkeys, fricasseed alligators, and snapping turtles a la daube. Various toasts were drank, and one of the chiefs called Stu-H-yah, or The Green Goshawk, made a speech two hours in length, which is thought to have surpassed those of Mr. Randolph in classical elegance and aptness of illustration. It is said the bride thought it rather too long. But the dinner went off, as the newspaper folks say, "with great hilarity and good feeling."

We were just sending the above lines to press when we received a bulky parcel by the mail, which, on opening, we found to be a whole loaf of wedding cake, with this card, "Colonel and Mrs. Hobson's compliments to the Editors of the Galaxy and Mercury." There is "no mistake" in the colonel, any more than in Sam Patch. The loaf is as big as a Roxbury pudding, and is garnished with all sorts of emblematical devices, drawn from the Chickasaw mythology. The principal group is a string of little, fat, purpy Chickasaw cupids, mounted on sucking pigs, and surrounding a rabbit perked up on its hind legs, in allusion to the name of the tawny bride. DOG STORY.

The Massachusetts Journal says:—After what we have seen of (caned pigs and military birds, we can believe almost any thing about animals," and then relates the following anecdote, derived from a Spanish gentleman who witnessed the fact. Truly no one will dispute the Journal's capacity for believing any thing, after a perusal of the statements here assumed to.

General Octavian, one of Napoleon's officers taken by the Spanish, was for a long time kept prisoner at Ceuta garrison, on the straits of Gibraltar. His favourite companion was a remarkable water dog. One day the general attempted to escape by swimming—he was discovered and pursued. The dog, having received instructions from his master, seized his hat, and holding it up in his teeth, swam at a distance from him, and in this way actually decoyed his pursuers for some time. The dog being caught, the deception was of course discovered, and both were carried back to prison. Here this remarkable animal continued to be his friend and factor. If he was ordered to carry a note and bring back an answer, it was done. He understood whatever was said in his presence; and when the general wished for the attendance of his barber, or any other person accustomed to serve him, the dog would go for him, and not come back without him. If money was given him to buy bread, he would go straightway to the baker's, and bring just as much as he was ordered, and no more. One day the general gave him four cents, done up in a silk handkerchief, and told him to go to the market and buy one pound of fish. The dog went immediately to the fish stall, and having patted his paws on the bench and laid down the money, waited patiently while the fish was weighing. The fishmonger, thinking it easy to deceive such a customer, ordered his boy to give him but three-quarters of a pound. Whether the dog knew the weights by sight, or saw any suspicious expression in the man's face, or actually understood the meaning of his words, is uncertain; but nothing could induce him to take the fish, after it was weighed; when ordered to do so, he perpetually answered with a short angry growl; and the man was obliged to give him good weight before he could force him away. This extraordinary animal attracted so much notice, that his master was induced to teach him to write, by holding a pen in both his paws. He succeeded wonderfully in this attempt; and perhaps this dog might have produced a popular book. (as other puppies have done,) had not the accursed ignorance of the Spanish priests condemned the interesting animal to death, from the very philosophical conclusion that no dog could possess so much more intelligence than they did, without "the devil helped him." General Octavian still remained in prison at the peace in 1814, and it is not known to us what became of him.

34- If we do not mistake matters very much the testimony elicited during the trial of Mather (the conclusion of which we publish this week,) will do much to "reform" the public mind concerning masonry. We recommend it to the attention of every one whose mind is biased against the masonic institution, or who entertains any doubts as to the principles upon which it is founded. The witnesses were principally renouncing masons, and some of them anti-masonic office holders; and the sincerity and honesty of their hue and cry against the "dangers of masonry," is admirably exemplified in their testimony.

We shall next week resume the publication of numbers on Popular Excitements from the Buffalo Journal. They are from an able pen, and well deserve a careful and attentive perusal.

35- The interesting address of our friend Dr. Hellen, of Beaufort, N. C. shall be inserted at the earliest opportunity.

The editor of The Parterre, published at Hartford, Conn., proposes to issue his work semi-monthly after the first of January. He says there is not at present a paper in Connecticut, "but what is devoted almost exclusively either to politics, religion, advertisements, or anti-masonry, and an impression exists that a periodical cannot be supported in that state except on one of these foundations." He is disposed to try the experiment, and we wish him success, as we do all who have enough courage to "do likewise." We do not know who the editor of the The Parterre is, but doubt not that he is a talented and clever fellow. We have a birdseye view of his philosophy in the following: "We have always believed that the man who makes his fellows laugh is quite a philanthropist. The world cannot jog comfortably along without amusement. Cynicks may snarl, but after all, mankind must have their way—weeping at what is sorrowful, and laughing at what is laughable. The task of making Mr. World always sad or always merry, we are not willing to take upon ourselves, but will rather be content with giving his ribs an occasional tickling, to keep him in humour with the graver part of our periodical."

The proposals of Messrs. Ames and Barnum, for publishing in the village of Rochester, a semi-monthly journal, under the title of The Spirit of the Age, have been before the public some time, and we should long since have complied with the request to publish them, had not the portion of our columns which we may reasonably devote to matter of the advertisement kind been pre-occupied. The objects of The Spirit of the Age are the most laudable, and should secure it the approbation and support of all good men. It will advocate "the abolition of Imprisonment for Debt; the abrogation of sanguinary Capital Punishments; the direct protection of government in favour of the labouring classes, by laws giving Mechanics a lien upon buildings erected by them, securing the implements of industry from sale by execution, and other provisions tending to shield the poor from the oppression of the rich;" and will be open to "discussions upon prison discipline, criminal law, temperance, and other subjects which may come within its range." Messrs. Ames and Barnum are gentlemen of talent and observation, and from a personal knowledge of them we have no doubt that the Spirit of the Age will be a valuable and efficient instrument in the cause of benevolence.

Mr. Eber P. Moon, one of the late editors of the Waterloo Observer, proposes to publish, in the village of Waterloo, a weekly newspaper, under the title of The Western Times. The first number will be issued on the first day of January. Mr. Moon avows his intention to oppose anti-masonry, intemperance, imprisonment for debt, the stoppage of the mails on Sunday, and the uniting of church and state. We do not ourselves apprehend "the uniting of church and state," though it cannot be denied that the nature of the opposition to Sunday mails is calculated to create a fear that such views are entertained by some who profess a very particular respect for the sanctity of the Sabbath.

THEATRE. The melodrama called The May Queen, or the Forger's Fate, was produced on Wednesday evening, for the first time in this city. Like most other melodramas, The May Queen was written to be played, and to show off some very fine scenery, and not to be read or criticised. Its plot is worthless, and it is indebted for the chief of its interest to the very lively and humorous-extraneous incidents, which the politic author has happily introduced into almost every scene. The best way to get knowledge of such a play, is to see it acted—a description of the real plot would not involve a word concerning its best (because its most pleasing) features. The May Queen is well cast—the strength of the company is brought forward, and the characters sit very well upon those who assume them. Mr. Webb sustains Hugh Bowyer with much ability; in some scenes, however, one is reminded of the same gentleman's imitation madness in The Lear of Private Life. Page's Sergeant Sampson is a spirited performance; he has a good idea of the character. Vernon and his wife (as usual) are perfectly "at home" in Caleb Pipkin, the bellows and kittle mender, and Patience, his very impatient wife. Little Knight (who, by the way, is a better actor than many who are more smiled upon) is very fair in Johnny Fly.

The celebrated Mr. Hackett is engaged for a few nights, and will appear on Monday evening, in the character of Solomon Swap. The house will undoubtedly be well attended.

The bills also announce the engagement of Mademoiselles Celeste, and Eliza Constance, for a few nights.

Lunatics in England. The prevalence of insanity in England, is no new doctrine. A late statistical report of lunatics and idiots in Great Britain, gives for England, 6,806 lunatics, and 5,741 idiots; total 12,547, or about one for every 1000 souls. In Wales, 133 lunatics, 782 idiots; total 915, (say 1000) or one to every 800. In Scotland, 3,632 lunatics, or one to every 574 of the population. In New York, in 1823, of 1,617,433 inhabitants, there were 319 lunatics, and 1,421 idiots; total 2,240, or about one to 721, a greater proportion of lunatics and idiots together, but about the same ratio of lunatics as in England, or one to 2,000. So if, as Hamlet said, they are all mad in England, the people of New York are no less under the influence of the moon, and in that respect as well as others, congenial and true descendants of the children of our "father-land." ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED.

The subscriber takes this method to return his gratitude for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength, and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses beauty, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlor Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the sucking. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlor fire—to boarding house keepers—to the masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee, now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 163 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

POETRY.

The following poem is from the London Keepsake, for 1830, and was written by Mr. Pringle, the editor of that work. In a brief introduction the author says that "the chief incidents of the tale were related to him by an African boy, whom he first met with near the borders of the great Karroo, or Arid Desert. The expression of the orphan stranger when asked about his kindred, was literally—"I am all alone in the world." A few slight circumstances, characteristic of the country, are almost all that has been added to poor Marossi's affecting narrative. The system of outrage and oppression of which this gives a specimen, has been ably developed by Dr. Philip, in his 'Researches in Africa.'"

THE BECHUANA BOY.

A STORY OF THE CAPE SETTLEMENT.

I sat at noon-tide in my tent,
And looked across the desert dun,
That 'neath the cloudless firmament
Lay gleaming in the sun;
When, from the bosom of the waste
A swarthy stripling came in haste,
With foot unshod and naked limb,
And a tame springbok following him.

He came with open aspect bland,
And modestly before me stood,
Caressing, with a kindly hand
That fawn of gentle brood;
Then, meekly gazing in my face,
Said in the language of his race,
(With smiling look, yet pensive tone)—
"Stranger!—I'm in the world alone!"

"Poor boy!" I said, "thy kindred's home,
Beyond far Stormberg's ridges blue,
Why wast thou left so young—to roam
This desolate Karroo!"
The smile forsook him while he spoke—
And when again he silence broke,
It was with many a stifled sigh
He told this strange sad history:—

"I have no kindred!" said the boy,
"The Bergenaars—by night they came,
And raised their murder-shout of joy,
While o'er our huts the flame
Rushed like a torrent; and their yell
Pealed louder as our warriors fell
In helpless heaps beneath their shot—
One living man they left us not!"

"The slaughter o'er, they gave the slain
To feast the foul-beaked birds of prey;
And with our herds across the plain
They hurried us away—
The widowed mothers and their brood;
Oft, in despair, for drink and food
We vainly cried—they heeded not,
But with sharp lash the captives smote.

"Three days we tracked that dreary wild,
Where thirst and anguish pressed us sore;
And many a mother and her child
Lay down to rise no more:
Behind us, on the desert brown,
We saw the vultures swooping down,
And heard, as the grim night was falling,
The gorged wolf to his comrade calling.

"At length was heard a river sounding
Midst that dry and dismal land,
And, like a troop of wild deer bounding,
We hurried to its strand—
Among the maddened cattle rushing,
The crowd behind still forward pushing,
Till in the flood our limbs were drenched,
And the fierce rage of thirst was quenched.

"Hoarse-roaring, dark, the broad Gareep
In turbid streams was sweeping fast—
Huge sea-cows in its eddies deep
Loud snorting as we passed;
But that relentless robber clan
Right through those waters wild and wan
Drove on, like sheep our captive host,
Nor staid to rescue wretches lost.

"All shivering from the frowning flood,
We stood upon the strangers' ground,
When, with proud looks and gestures rude,
The white men gathered round:
And there, like cattle from the fold,
By Christians we were bought and sold,
'Midst laughter loud and looks of scorn,—
And roughly from each other torn.

"My mother's scream so long and shrill,
My little sister's wailing cry,
(In dreams I often hear them still!)
Rose wildly to the sky
A fiercer heart came to me then,
And madly 'mong those ruthless men

I sprang!—Alas! dashed on the sand,
Bleeding, they bound me foot and hand.

"Away—away on bounding steeds
The white men stealers fleetly go,
Through long low valleys fringed with reeds,
O'er mountains capped with snow,—
Each with his captive, far and fast;
Until yon rock-bound ridge was passed,
And distant slopes of cultured soil
Bespoke the land of tears and toil.

"And tears and toil have been my lot
Since I the white man's thrall became,
And sorer griefs I wish forgot—
Harsh blows and burning shame.
Oh, English chief! thou ne'er canst know
The injured bondman's bitter woe.
When round his heart, like scorpions, cling
Black thoughts, that madden while they sting!
"Yet this hard fate I might have borne,
And taught, in time, my soul to bend,
Had my sad yearning beast forlorn
But found a single friend:
My race extinct, or far removed,
The boor's rough brood I could have loved—
But each to whom my bosom turned,
Even like a hound the black boy spurned!

"While, friendless thus, my master's flocks
I tended on the upland waste,
It chanced this fawn leapt from the rocks,
By wolfish wild-dogs chased:
I rescued it, though wounded sore,
All dabbled with its mother's gore,
And nursed in a cavern wild,
Until it loved me like a child.

"Gently I nursed it—for I thought
(Its hapless fate so like to mine)
By good Utika it was brought,
To bid me not repine—
Since, in this world of wrong and ill,
One creature lived to love me still,
Although its dark and dazzling eye
Beamed not with human sympathy.

"Thus lived I, a lone orphan lad,
My task, the proud boor's flocks to tend;
And this pet fawn was all I had
To love, or call my friend;
When, suddenly, with haughty look
And taunting words, the tyrant took
My playmate for his pampered boy,
Who eased me my only joy.

"High swelled my heart!—but, when the star
Of midnight gleamed, I softly led
My bounding favourite forth, and far
Into the desert fled
And there from human kind exiled,
Four moons on roots and berries wild
I've fared—and braved the beasts of prey,
To 'scape from spoilers worse than they.

"But yester morn a Bushman brought
The tidings that thy tents were here—
And now rejoicing I've sought
Thy presence—void of fear;
Because they say, O English chief,
Thou scornest not the captive's grief:
Then let me serve thee—as thine own—
For I am in the world alone!"

Such was Marossi's touching tale,
Our breasts they were not made of stone—
His words, his winning looks prevail—
We took him for "our own":
And one, with woman's gentle art,
Unlocked the fountains of his heart,
And love gushed forth, till he became
Her child—in every thing but name.

LOVE AND FOLLY.

Love's worshippers alone can know
The thousand mysteries that are his;
His blazing torch, his twanging bow,
His blooming age, are mysteries.
A charming science! but the day
Were all too short to con it o'er;
So take of me this little lay,
A sample of its boundless lore.
While in the gardens of the skies,
Folly and Love, as children do,

Played, ere the god had lost his eyes,
A quarrel rose betwixt the two
Love said the gods should do him right,
But Folly vowed to do it then
And struck him, o'er the orbs of sight,
So hard, he never saw again.

His lovely mother's grief was deep,
She called for vengeance on the deed—
A beauty does not vainly weep,
Nor coldly does a mother plead.
A shade came o'er the eternal bliss
That fills the dwellers of the skies;
Even iron-hearted Nemises
And Rhadamanthus wiped their eyes.

"Behold," she said, "this lovely boy"—
While freshly streamed her graceful tears,
"Immortal, yet shut out from joy
"And sunshine all his future years.
"The child can never take, you see,
"A single step without a staff:
"The hardest punishment would be
"Too lenient for the crime, by half."

All owned that Love had suffered wrong,
And well should be avenged, they said;
Then weighed the public interest long,
And long the party's interest weighed.
And thus decreed the court above—
"Since Love is blind from Folly's blow,
"Let Folly be the guide of Love,
"Where'er the boy may choose to go."

SINGULAR OLD SONNET.

AUTHOR UNKNOWN.

The longer life, the more offence;
The more offence, the greater pain;
The greater pain, the less defence;
The less defence, the lesser gain;
The loss of gain, long ill doth try;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.

The shorter life, less count I find;
The less account, the sooner made;
The count soon made, the merrier mind;
The merrier mind doth thought invade;
Short life in truth this thing doth try;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.

Come, gentle death, the ebb of care;
The ebb of care, the flood of life;
The flood of life, the joyfull fare;
The joyfull fare, the end of strife;
The end of strife, that thing wish I;
Wherefore come, death, and let me die.

EPIGRAM.

BY S. T. COLERIDGE.

Sly Beelzebub took all occasions
To try Job's constancy, and patience.
He took his honour, took his health;
He took his children, took his wealth;
His servants, horses, oxen, cows—
But cunning Satan did not take his spouse.

But heaven, that brings out good from evil,
And loves to disappoint the devil,
Had pre-determined to restore,
Twofold all he had before;
His servants, oxen, horses, cows—
Short sighted devil, not to take his spouse!

POPULAR EXCITEMENTS.

NO. VI.

The effects of popular excitement, in the case of the popish, and the meal tub plots, we have seen. Those effects were, the separation of friends, dissensions in neighbourhoods and families, perverted construction of the acts of citizens, suspicions of pretended enormities, which were finally converted into specific charges, and these charges often led to the conviction of innocent persons; and this, in many instances, ended in the actual execution of the pretended malefactor. Such was the melancholy fate of Stafford, as we have seen; and as the notorious Oates was conspicuous in the conviction, it may be useful to resume his history.

During those manifestations of zeal for "the publick good" which characterised the national guardians in whose behalf Oates was acting, such was the popular phrensy, that nothing to which he had sworn could be so far disproved as to institute a single doubt of its truth in the publick mind. Time, however, brought reflection; and with it returned the reasoning powers of which the nation had been temporarily deprived. When this was accomplished, "each man looked upon his neighbour with a mixture of astonishment and dismay, wondering at the lethargick effect of the singular reverie in which all had been recently walking." To retrieve, as far as possible, the lost honor of the nation, and to atone, in some degree, for the mischief which their imprudent credulity had produced, the undecieved populace took effectual measures to bring Oates to trial for his numerous perjuries; and never was felon convicted upon fuller testimony. On one point, to which he had sworn, his perjury was shown by twenty-two unimpeachable witnesses; and upon another, no less than forty-seven persons of known and tried veracity, collectively established his premeditated guilt. Upon such unequivocal testimony, was this man convicted; and he who by falsehood had brought innocence to the scaffold and the block, was sentenced "to be fined one thousand marks, on each indictment, to be whipped on two different days, from Aldgate to Newgate, and from Newgate to Tyburn, to be imprisoned during life, and to be pilloried five times in each year." Five principal persons, who had been impeached on the testimony of Oates, were now discharged from custody and disgrace, by the house of Peers; which body also voted a reversal of Stafford's attainder, whose life had been sacrificed to the cry of aspirants for "the publick safety."

The excitement by which we are at present surrounded, although it bears many striking resemblances to those produced by the employers of Oates and Dangerfield, still, in one particular, essentially differs. The two latter, it is true, sent innocent men to their graves; but the former has a contrary effect. It has already twice invaded the dark and silent chambers of death: twice has it dragged forth, from the dark slumbers of the tomb the mouldering forms of our fellow men, and exposed them to the gaze, the scoff and the jest of the profane, to the end that our laws and our freedom may descend in their purity to our children.

But, if the history of England furnishes strong parallels to the present excitement, in some particulars, that of Scotland provides them equally so in others. The popular excitement which prevailed in Scotland, in 1682, is well known. It was a time, like the present, when aspirants sought for the publick good, and the preservation of the laws, to let loose the passions of one portion of the population, to be directed against the other, for the preservation of peace and good order. The charges against one individual seem in point here. Upon a complaint for treason he was accused of having been seen in company with a rebel, though that person had never been marked out as such, either by process or proclamation. "The inferences," says the historian, "upon which Weir was condemned, hung upon each other, after the following manner: No man, it was assumed, could have been in a rebellion, without being exposed to suspicion, in the neighbourhood: if the neighbourhood had suspected him, it was to be presumed that each individual had, likewise, heard of the grounds of suspicion; every man was bound to declare to the government, his suspicion against every man, and to avoid the company of traitors: and the conclusion on the whole, was, you have conversed with a rebel, therefore, you are yourself a rebel. Of this conviction it was determined to make use as a precedent, and courts of judicature were in consequence, erected, in certain counties, to continue for three years: for the purpose of carrying on a strict inquiry against this new species of crime." The investigating mind might almost be led to doubt the truth of these fantastical departures from the plain principles of justice, had not the two last years furnished by repetition, such ample evidence of their veracity, as to leave no room for so charitable a conclusion. The arguments which are here made to terminate in proof of guilt, strongly resemble the religious scruple of the Arab who, because his sacred volume forbade his plundering the living, put a traveller to death, that he might afterwards possess himself of his riches, without doing violence to his own conscience. "Yet," in the language of another, "it is no wonder that faction is so productive of vices of all kinds; for, besides that it inflames all the passions, it tends much to remove those great restraints, honour and shame; when zealots find that no iniquity can lose them the applause of their own party, and no innocence secure those against whom their calumnies are directed."

REASON.

NO. VII.

The attention of my readers is now called to the machinations of the guardians of publick order and national prosperity, as exemplified in the well known case of the Salem Witchcraft. Hitherto my examinations have been confined to other nations, the inhabitants of distant lands: but now we are to examine the deeds of our own nation—our forefathers: the transactions, as it were, of yesterday. In this, as in other publick delusions, the officious demagogue shrouded himself from justice by pointedly avowing his regard for religion and the laws; and by urging the necessity of protecting our civil institutions. The dates of the occurrences at Salem are so modern that no plea of the darkness of the age can apply in their extenuation, especially when we reflect that that this scene was in the immediate vicinity of Harvard College, and that many of the most able and prominent men of that learned institution, were deeply concerned in the tragedy.

The commencement of the delusion is traced, in its history, to a physician, who declared he could not cure his patient, because he "was under an evil hand." This avowal was seized upon by the "guardians of the publick good," a class ever humanely active, who at once became clearly satisfied of the existence of a secret plot, between the Devil, in person, on the one part, and certain of the people of Salem, on the other, for the subversion of both government and laws. By assiduous labour and close observation, the "publick guardians" were enabled to give such a colour and direction to the growing panic as in some degree to comport with their designs respecting it. The phrensy soon reached that head, when, to adopt the language of history, "confidence between man and man in a great measure ceased. Every one was suspicious of his neighbour, and alarmed for himself. Business was interrupted, and many fled from their dwellings. Terror was in every countenance, and distress in every heart. Every little precinct was the scene of some direful tale of witchery. Reports of this nature were circulated in all directions, and were located in every neighbourhood. Several circumstances, attending the first cases of reputed witchcraft tended to mislead the people, and these operated on feeble minds so effectually as to produce a forced belief in the immediate agency of evil spirits. The alarm was sudden and terrible. Children not twelve years of age were allowed to give their testimony. Indians were brought to relate their own personal knowledge of invisible beings; and women publicly told their frights." Such was the process by which, to adopt the inelegant but forcible language of a writer of that day, "the government was so sullied by that hobgoblin monster, witchcraft, whereby this country was nightmared, and harassed, at such a rate as is not easily imagined."

During this diseased state of the publick mind, in vain

did the innocent victims appeal to the rational dictates of common discretion, in defence of their characters, their property and their lives. Disordered misrule had penetrated the very halls of justice; and giddy delirium surmounted the judicial bench. When the accused pleaded the well known facts of his orderly life, to mitigate suspicion, he was derided for his weakness, or commanded to be silent; if he offered testimony in defence, it was rejected unheard; and when he plead for a day's respite of the sentence of execution, he was told that his existence endangered the state. Such was the summary process by which this popular excitement consigned its innocent victims to the tomb. The delusion continued only from March till October, of the same year; and during this short period, nineteen citizens were publicly executed, and eight others were condemned to die, without a single person's having been acquitted, upon trial. Fifty persons during the same period confessed themselves witches, of whom not one was either convicted or tried; as the confession of the crime was received in full atonement for the offence. Besides these the prisons contained upwards of one hundred and fifty suspected persons, and two hundred others stood publicly accused, who had not been arrested. The estates of the accused even before conviction, were seized as forfeit for the public use; yet, observes the historian, "the publick coffers were not enriched by these confiscations, as the avails of such estates never reached the treasury, but were rather parcelled about among those who did assiduously labour in the quelling of these enormities." So implacable were the feelings engendered by this popular excitement, that the culprits' bodies were not decently buried, after death; but a spirit of persecution was still carried on against them. At one of the executions where six persons were hanged, their bodies were dragged by the ropes from the gallows to a hole between two rocks, into which they were thrown, after being plundered of their clothes, and left with their feet, hands, and some of their faces still uncovered! It is not the deeds of a barbarous age that I am now recording; nor yet of a savage people. These awful scenes were acted in a sister state of our present political compact; and no more than 136 years have elapsed since the close of the tragedy. There are many among us whose near relatives were present and took a part in what I describe; nor am I certain that I am not of the number. It was an infatuation that seized upon every class alike: no one was exempt from the disease, or its consequences, for and there was none to stay the torrent, or call back man to himself. Even the instigators of the calamity stood aghast, and witnessed, with dismay, the raging of the storm which they had excited but could not allay.

"Delusion's self was mad;"

REASON.

NO. VIII.

The points of resemblance between the present popular excitement here, and the one in Massachusetts, 139 years since, are many and striking. In the present one, we have seen the guardians of publick safety traducing the innocent, both living and dead; and disturbing like the peace of families and the quiet of the grave. One individual has been immured in prison for a deed of which he had no knowledge, and the lifeless corps of another has been mutilated, by some ruffian hand, for the declared purpose of exciting the populace to the practice of virtue and religion.

When the collective passions of the people are perversely excited, the voice of justice cannot be heard, and misrule can no longer be stayed. Such was the fact in the case of the "Salem Witchcraft." It was asserted that certain persons had free exercise of all the powers of vision, when their eyes were fully closed; that powers of partial omnipresence enabled them to occupy several parts of a room at one and the same time; and that the person so subdividing himself could invisibly bite spectators, leaving the deep prints of teeth in their flesh, although age had long before deprived him of all the implements by which such prints were produced. Such are among the vain imaginations of our fathers, at the rehearsal of which we now smile incredulously; yet so great was the delusion of the day when they were told, that full credit was given to them by those very ancestors whose memory we delight to honour, and whose general characters we admire. By the advantages derived from such misguided phrensy as this, did the promoters of the excitement obtain their power. It was a publick mania, and while they could direct its course, they fattened upon the delusion. Suspected persons were scarcely deposited in prison, when their dwellings were emptied of their contents, their cellars plundered of all family stores, their children driven into the streets to subsist by charity or to perish, and their cattle slaughtered and bared for distant markets. In the present instance the same direct attack upon property is not yet made; but it is demanded that the power of both making and administering our laws shall in future devolve exclusively upon the promoters of this excitement; and, were that effected, it would enable them to accomplish, by virtue of statute, what, in the scenes of Salem, though unlawful in itself, was disregarded by the authorities. In the Salem excitement, no less than in the present one, all were accused as enemies and conspirators who did not assist in the general denunciation. A respectable magistrate of the neighbourhood, after committing more than forty persons to prison, upon trivial charges of witchcraft, in accordance with the prevalent feeling by which he was surrounded, refused to assist farther in what he began to suspect was wickedly designed. His refusal was scarcely made publick when both himself and his wife were accused of sorcery—and the discovery was then first made that he had killed no less than nine persons by his diabolical incantations. The unhappy man, finding no safety but in flight, abandoned his dwelling, in company with the partner of his bosom, at the dread hour of midnight, and sought and obtained safety in a neighbouring province. When the guardians of publick safety discovered their victim had escaped, they instantly accused his brother as a party to the crime; but here too, they were unfortunate, as the accused escaped by a hasty flight. Others, when accused, were less fortunate; and when taken, horrid tortures awaited all those who denied the crime charged. "Many were bound hand and foot, in so relentless a manner that the blood gushed out of their noses; and one was thrown fettered upon the ground, and timbers laid upon him, until his tongue, protruding from his mouth, the sheriff thrust it back with his cane—at the same time bidding him confess he was possessed, and then he might go. This he still refusing, more weight was added, until his life was finally pressed out of him forever."

In the very height of this misrule and slaughter, an accident broke the charm, and restored peace to community. Upon a publick examination, a witness "fell into a fit, and on recovering testified that the prisoner had invisibly stabbed her in the breast with a penknife, the blade of which had broken and a part of which was remaining in the flesh. This she produced, but the corresponding part of the blade, with the handle, was also produced, by a person in a distant part of the room, who broke the knife the day before, and threw the piece in the street, which the witness now had." This incident, although it could not save the life of the unfortunate prisoner, wrought a perfect revolution in publick opinion. A gentleman of Boston, who was next accused, instead of pleading his defence, commenced an action for slander, which immediately released him from suspicion. The next and last subject, was the wife of the Governour, who was charged in the usual form with sorcery. This was the closing scene. Finding the storm had reached their own habitations, the "guardians of the publick order" could no longer dissemble. Fresh accusations were disregarded, prisoners released from confinement, and restored to their families, and the whole investigation at once abandoned.

When the rage of passions had been thus calmed, and reason had returned from her exile, the deluded Jurors, in the language of the historian, "wept aloud for their mistaken deeds, and otherwise demeaned themselves rather like culprits than like men called to pronounce upon others." The language of contrition which they offered to the publick, in their first lucid interval, is still extant, and deserves a place here. "We confess," say they, "that we ourselves were not capable to understand, nor able to withstand the mysterious delusions that have been upon us, and we justly fear that we have taken up with such evidence as was insufficient to touch the lives of any, in which we truly fear that we were sadly deluded and mistaken. For these grievous oversights, we are much disquieted and distressed in our minds, and do humbly beg forgiveness of God. We do heartily ask forgiveness of you all, whom we have justly offended; and do declare, according to our present minds, we would none of us do such things again, on such grounds for the whole world; and we pray God to forgive us."

VALUE OF GREATNESS.

Mr. Pope was with Sir Godfrey Kneller one day, when his nephew, a Guinea trader, came in. "Nephew," said Sir Godfrey, "you have the honour of seeing the two greatest men in the world." "I don't know how great you may be," said the Guinea-man, "but I don't like your looks: I have often bought a man much better than both of you together, all muscles and bones, for ten guineas."

SOUND DOCTRINE.

UPON THE DUTY OF DIFFUSING USEFUL KNOWLEDGE.

"The true standard of value for a man, is the degree of his efficiency in the social system, and the strength of his morals and sympathies." National Gazette.

We fearlessly say, that nothing on earth ought to be precious or agitating, or delightful, or glorious, compared with the hope of raising human nature towards the virtue, the nobleness, and bliss of which it is capable, and of which it has so lamentably failed. If any one should smile at our phrase, or our meaning—provided he were worth disputing with, we would say to him:—Every thing centres here. The cause of human nature is the great cause compared with which every thing on earth dwindles into insignificance. Every thing is suspended upon it. Governments, institutions, laws, sceptres, dominions, are good or evil, only as they rouse or depress the human soul. Freedom is but a name, wisdom is but craft, and learning is but folly, if it do not help this cause. That glory of God, of which the theologians say so much, must receive its chief illustrations on earth, from the advancement of human nature. The mystery of providence grows dark without this prospect. The experience of ages has been wasted if it does not come to this result; the long series of human griefs and struggles has been wasted: and toils and labours have been spent, and holy tears and precious blood have been poured out in vain, but for this. But for this, the brightest and most soothing imaginations of genius are unproductive reveries; and the world of inspiration will not accomplish that whereto it is sent; and holy prayers of faith will have gone forth into the empty air; and the rapt soul of the seer, and the watcher, and the waiting servant of God, "rapt into futuro" and better "times," must have grown dark and desolate as ever.

The hope of human nature is the christian's hope. The Master of christians laboured, and prayed, and suffered for it. None of all the philosophers and sages with whom he is sometimes compared, ever took human nature by the hand; stooped to it, in its lowest forms, communed with it in its deepest miseries, saw the pearl of great price beneath the despised garb of publicans and sinners; none ever approached even so far as enthusiasm towards the all-absorbing mission and aim of Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost. And nothing but this religion, we may add, will ever make men feel as they ought towards the improvement of their kind. The world, the ambitious, covetous, voluptuous, and selfish world, will idly pass it by. The infidel philosopher will scowl with misanthropic scorn, over the picture which he has drawn of human debasement. It is only Christian men who will take this holy cause home to their hearts, and ponder it, and pray over it, and so identify themselves with their race, as almost to feel that they individually rise or fall, prosper or fail, with the great cause of human nature; who solace even their private and individual griefs with it; who bear up under the load of depressed spirits, and beguile their very sickness and sorrow with this cheering expectation.

There are many that go forth, and we wish that we could go forth with them, to muse and moralize and kindle up glorious enthusiasm, amidst the ruins of ancient art. But we feel that there are holier ruins all around us—the ruins of human nature. The crumbling columns and temples of the elder world present no such ruins—none at once so noble and mournful as every man may approach in the waste temple of his own mind.

The truth is, we have not yet considered what human nature might be. We have taken our ideas of it rather from the abuse than from the use of its powers. Men have not made the requisite exertion, nor in the right direction for their development. No age has been entirely favourable to this endeavour; no state of society, no maxims of life, no system of education. Things act upon the mind in combination; and even where one part of the system of influences is brought to considerable perfection, as learning, or liberty, for instance, there are so many things bad around it, as more than half to neutralize its good effects. The aggregate of social influences, at any rate that have borne upon the human character, has been unfriendly to its elevation. We have seen, therefore little of what men may be. On no subject, it is to be apprehended, are duller conceptions prevailing than on this; what man might be, what he ought to be, what a noble being he was designed to stand forth, the lord of this lower creation. Alas, men of taste can more easily tell you the fine points of a noble steed or a splendid edifice, in fact of any thing, than the admirable properties of human nature. And how is it strange, then, that men have thought meanly of that nature and its true dignity—a theme that should shake our pulpits as with thunder, and be sounded out with a voice as to wake the dead—although it has been considered little better than a phrase of sickening sentiment, and a topic of puerile declamation. We talk about the badness of human nature; but do any of us consider what a bad chance it has had? We have starved it, and dwarfed it; and at length we end the series of wrongs by scorning it. Look abroad upon the surface of society, and especially in the old world, and say what chance is there but that which the furnace gives to the ore, that amidst the feverish struggles of ambition, the graspings of covetousness, the obstinate hold of the selfish upon all they have, the proud exclusiveness of the higher classes, the jealousies of the lower, the toils of the poor, and the indulgences of the voluptuous—what chance is there that any noble and manly virtues will grow up to their just height? What chance has there been for the mass of men in those countries to be intelligent? And if not intelligent, what chance have they had of being free, virtuous and happy? What chance is there that wisdom will spring from the beaten paths of cruel and mechanical toil, from the dust and din of oppressive and unrelieved labour, or from gew-gaw distinctions and titles? In one word, from that rubbish of superannuated folly in every form, that is so plentifully mingled with almost all the social and political institutions of the world? Do the spade and the plough teach knowledge? Do spinning jennies-discourse wisdom? Are stars and garters masonick emblems? These questions will not be misconstrued, we presume, into a proposal rashly to abolish titles; much less to abolish toils. Nevertheless, we do conceive that this part of the system is about as badly arranged as it can be for the real improvement of men. It is work, work, work, on the one hand, and on the other a no less fatal leisure and independence. On the one hand it is dire and reckless poverty; and on the other a dissolute and reckless superfluity. If some thing of all this mighty exertion, and enterprise, and labour, and expcuditure, which makes up the active world, could be converted to the cause of human improvement, if all the energies of human nature and life could be combined, and devoted to this end; if we could see individual men putting forth their powers to the utmost effort and trial, keeping a sleepless watch over themselves, pressing forward every day, and every day making new advances, regarding every attainment as a step from which to reach higher and further, if we could see stepping forth on the theatre of this world with the noble demeanour and countenance that would become beings so exalted, we should then begin to perceive what men might be, what they never have been. We should then be able boldly to point to such an example, to redeem the long abiding reproach of human nature. It is a sad reflection, but we must dwell upon it. We must say, and will say, without hesitation, that we are dissatisfied, with any state of society that ever yet has existed as a field for human improvement. When we look over the world, and the world's history, there is nothing so fitted to strike and pain the mind as the extreme contrast between what the world was evidently made to be, and what it is. Even from the simple external aspect of things we may gather this conclusion. It is a fair creation, and was fitted for noble influences and uses. The glorious canopy of the heavens was not designed to be spread over an ignoble race. And every thing beneath—the elements, waters, groves, hills and valleys, are moulded into forms of enrapturing beauty, that have power, one might imagine, to impart their own beauty to the minds that dwell among them. The human soul is capable of being touched to these finer issues. And if, knowing all this, a stranger from some distant world should alight upon our planet—if a stranger to the actual state of things, but knowing what it might be, should alight amid the fair and rich scenes of our summer landscapes, he would expect the inhabitants of such a world to sweep by him with the majestic step and mien of angels, with their robes of light, and their voices "discoursing music." "These," he would say, "are the abodes of innocence. Here dwell inviolate truth, and faith, and divine simplicity, and blessed friendship. Brethren dwell here, and this fair earth is not rent with violence, nor watered with tears, nor stained with blood, nor does it bear the footsteps of the proud and scornful, nor does it echo to the complaints of the neglected or miserable." Alas! how different is the reality! How lamentable is the story of human fortunes all over the world! Oh! it is wonderful that a set of beings, endowed with sense, (to say nothing of the moral soul,) should have played the fool and the maniac as men have done. Look at things upon a great scale, or at things upon a small scale, and we find it every where the same. Look at war, that stupendous insanity. Look at the single history of that being who has gone to his account with the blood of two millions of men staining his imperial robe, and the groans of millions unnumbered, to usher him to his audit—and yet to listen to the canonizing shout of half the world, as the wonderful story of his awful career is told, and compute, if you can, the immensity of the guilt on the one hand, and the folly on the other. Look, again, at the vast regions of groaning servitude; and then at the more numerous and more miserable slaves of vice, that are crowding the ten thousand avenues of death and destruction, in the villages and cities of the world. Then descend into the retreats of private and domestic life, and see how many untold miseries of passion are there; and at last penetrate into the recesses of the human heart, and see it, restless, disordered, and discontented, suffering wounds without cause, and afflictions without reason—miserable when it might be happy, evil when to be good is its interest as much as its duty. Add to all this those delusions of opinion, those mistakes of abused human nature, those lies of the perverted heart, by which this mighty system of national, social, and individual sin and folly is supported, and it seems almost as if there was neither light nor hope. There is darkness upon the nations, and it is almost the darkness of despair; darkness in their institutions, their pursuits, their plans of enjoyment, their very ideas of happiness. After six thousand years of teaching, men have not learned to live, either as physical, or as intellectual, or as moral beings. The science of living well and happily is the science least of all understood, or even studied. The reckless waste of life, and of all that is good in life, which we see everywhere—this universal seeking of happiness abroad, when the springs of it are at home within us; this blinding and bigoted folly of accounting sin a pleasure, and duty a task tedious and irksome in the performance; and then these bewildering voices of ambition, avarice, and pleasure, which fill the world with strife and uproar; this press and throng of selfish passions and worldly competitions; these contests for distinction; these jealousies of fashion, wit, and beauty; these bitter sighings of discontent. Alas! what power, what mighty power is ever to correct such evils? If we should answer that we do not know, we should be false to our own principles. We do hope in human nature, after all its mistakes. We do trust in the reason of man, that he will yet be schooled to wisdom. We do confide in his conscience, that it will yet gather strength to resist temptation. We do believe that all experience is not to be lost upon a reasoning, inquiring, and suffering world. We believe in God, and are firmly persuaded that his designs are better for us than human life has yet unfolded. Let each one begin with himself; let him make himself wiser and better. That is the first and great work. Let the tone of Education, and Morality and Religion be raised. Let the learned contribute their knowledge, the lofty their influence, the wise their legislation, the powerful their authority, and the good their prayers, to the one, great, united, universal effort, to make the world better and happier.

EXCERPTS.

Above all things raillery decline,
Nathre but few does for that task assign;
'Tis in the ablest hands a dangerous tool,
But never fails to wound the meddling fool;
For all must grant it needs no common art
To keep men patient when we make them smart,
No wit alone, nor humour's self will do,
Without good nature and much prudence too,
To judge aright of persons, place and time;
For taste decrees what's low, and what's sublime.

Stillingfleet.

Justice. Justice is grave and decorous, and in its punishments rather seems to submit to a necessity than to make a choice. Burke.

Jacobinism is the revolt of the enterprising talents of a country against its property. When private men form themselves into associations for the purpose of destroying the pre-existing laws and institutions of their country; when they secure to themselves an army by dividing amongst the people of no property, the estates of the ancient and lawful proprietors; when a state recognizes these acts; when it does not make confiscations for crimes, but crimes for confiscations; when it has its principle strength, and all its resources, in such a violation of property; when it stands chiefly upon such a violation, massacring by judgments, or otherwise, those who make any struggle for their old legal government, and their legal, hereditary, or acquired possessions—I call this jacobinism by establishment. Ibid.

Examples. Fear is but a dubious, a treacherous teacher of duty. Examples are of much greater efficacy with men, for they not only direct to virtue, but prove that it is not impossible to practice what they admonish. Pliny.

Reformation. Queen Elizabeth had so much of her father in her that instead of improving the reformation begun by Edward, she often repented she had gone so far. Thus, when the dean of St. Paul's, in a sermon at court, spoke aloud with some dislike of the sign of the cross, her majesty called aloud to him her closet, commanding him to desist from that ungodly digression, and to return to his text. Warner's Ecclesiastical History.

Writing is like building, wherein the undertaker, to supply some defect, or remedy some inconvenience, which at first he foresaw not, is usually forced to exceed his first model, and many times to double the charge and expense of it. Scott.

Conquest. All lawful conquest supposes that the conqueror has just reason to wage war against the vanquished. Without this, conquest is by no means of itself a just title; for a man cannot acquire a sovereignty over a nation by a bare seizure as over a thing which belongs to nobody. Thus, when Alexander waged war against a distant people, who had never heard of his name, certainly such a conquest was no more a title to the lawful sovereignty, than robbery is lawful means of becoming rich. The quality and number of the people do not change the nature of the action; the injury is the same, and the crime equal.

A Legacy. Among other legacies, Dr. Jasper Main bequeathed to an old servant, an old trunk, and somewhat in it, he said, that would make him drink. No sooner did the doctor expire, than the servant, full of expectation, visited the trunk, in hopes of finding some money, or other treasure; but, to his great disappointment, the legacy with which he had filled his imagination, proved no other than a red herring.

Cibber's Lives of the Poets.

Anacharsis has passed a verdict upon democracy, which has at least the merit of being laconick. "Wise men propose, and fools decide."

De Cataneo.

True religion is the perfection of human nature, and the joy and delight of every one that feels it active and strong within him. Of this I write with more concern and emotion, because I have felt this the true, and indeed the only joy which runs through a man's heart and life. It is that which has been for many years my greatest support. I rejoice daily in it. I feel from it the earnestness of that supreme joy which I pant and long for. I am sure there is nothing else can afford any true or complete happiness. I have, considering my sphere, seen a great deal of all that is most shining and tempting in this world. The pleasures of sense I did soon nauseate. Intrigues of state, and the conduct of affairs have something in them that is more spacious; and I was for some years deeply immersed in these, but still with hopes of reforming the world, and of making mankind wiser and better. But I have found that which is crooked cannot be made straight. I acquainted myself with knowledge and learning, and that in a great variety. This yielded not happiness. I cultivated friendship. But this also I have found was vanity and vexation of spirit, although it be of the best and noblest sort. The sum is, vanity of vanities, all is vanity, besides fearing God, and keeping the commandments. Gilbert Burnet.

WINTER.

Hast thou come again—our old—our good, old, kind-hearted friend of lang syne? Well—old gentleman, here is a hand for thee to shake, and we greet thee lovingly with right good will. Blessings on that frosty head and blue nose of thine! they are the same as when we hailed them welcome in the days of our boyhood. Aye, Winter was Winter then—and the light of thy venerable countenance carried joy to every heart.

They say thou art growing melancholy, old neighbor—that thine eyes overflow with rheum, and that thy hand is freezing cold. Shame on them! Those are tears of joy; and, if thy hand smacks somewhat of the icicle, let thine enemies shake it till their blood tingles again in their veins. Melancholy!—thou art the veriest wag of the whole family—the grand marshall of fun and frolic—the anointed prince of light hearts and heels. Melancholy! Bacchus were a Dutchman to thee. Cold!—Let them build a fire for thee—thou art not such a fool as to laugh without a fire. Let them welcome thee—an old-fashioned wit—in the old-fashioned way—and, our word for it, the very roof-tree will shake with thy good-natured mirth. Cold! Pile on the wood—bring forth the ruddy tankard of October—the fragrant basket of Greenings—the broad bowl of shagbarks—and see if Summer, in all her glory, can dispense life and heat like thee. See if even the miser's flinty heart does not begin to warm at thy approach. Draw out the fiddle! Marshall your ranks—young and old—fathers, mothers, aunts, and cousins—the whole of you! Now—one, two, three!—There!—it is a cold, melancholy, rheumatic old cynic, that sets such lively spirits in motion!—No, our old friend!—it is too common that benefactors are belied—and they belie thee most foully—they do indeed. Would that thy detractors could boast of deeds as brave, and hearts as free and warm as thine.

Come, thou dweller in the stormy caves of the North! Come from thy mountain-home! Glad hearts are waiting to hear thy hoarse voice in the sky. Touch the hills!—Spread thy mantle in the valleys! The merry bells are impatient to ring forth the joys of thy appearing. The virgin has prepared the best room—and her heart sits lightly on its throng—for thou hast promised her a lover at thy coming. Speak to the waters! The Skater's shout shall answer thee, as his iron heel thrills along the glittering chrysal. Breathe on the forest-boughs!—The twigs become networks of burnished silver sprinkled with diamonds. Spring has wrought no enchantment so beautiful as thine. The architect gazes with awe upon the temples thou hast builded in the Northern Seas—and the lover of beauty stops to admire thy cunning work where thou art busy with the snow-wreath. Come, thou harbinger of the dance and song—we love thy hoary locks, for they mind us of youth, and love, and joy. It is meet they should be revered, for thou bearest age without its austerity, and art venerable without being unsocial or unhappy.

"WE'LL SEE ABOUT IT."

BY MRS. HALL.

"We'll see about it!" From that simple sentence has arisen more evil to Ireland than any person, ignorant of the strange union of impetuosity and procrastination my countrymen exhibit, could well believe. They are sufficiently prompt and energetic where their feelings are concerned, but, in matters of business, they almost invariably prefer seeing about to doing.

I shall not find it difficult to illustrate this observation. From the many examples of its truth, in high and low life, I select Philip Garraty.

Philip, and Philip's wife, and Philip's children, and all of the house of Garraty, are employed from morning till night in seeing about every thing, and, consequently, in doing nothing. There is Philip—a tall, handsome, good-humoured fellow, of about five-and-thirty, with broad, lazy looking shoulders, and a smile perpetually lurking about his mouth, or in his bright hazel eyes—the picture of indolence and kindly feeling. There he is, leaning over what was once a five-barred gate, and leads to the haggart; his blue worsted stockings full of holes, which the saggan, twisted half way up the well formed leg, fail to conceal; while his brogues, (to use his own words,) if they do let the water in, let it out again. With what unstudied elegance does he roll that knotted twine and then unroll it; varying his occupation, at times, by kicking the stones that once formed a wall into the stagnant pool, scarcely large enough for full-grown ducks to sail in.

But let us first take a survey of the premises.

The dwelling-house is a long, rambling abode, much larger than the generality of those that fall to the lot of small Irish farmers: but the fact is, that Philip rents one of the most extensive farms in the neighbourhood, and ought to be "well to do in the world." The dwelling looks very comfortable, notwithstanding; part of the thatch is much decayed, and the rank weeds and damp moss nearly cover it; the door posts are only united to the wall by a few scattered portions of clay and stone, and the door itself is hanging but by one hinge; the window frames shake in the passing wind, and some of the compartments are stuffed with the crown of a hat, or a "lock of straw"—very unsightly objects. At the opposite side of the swamp is the haggart gate, where a broken line of alternate palings and wall exhibit proof that it had formerly been fenced in; the commodious barn is almost roofless, and the other sheds pretty much in the same condition; the pig-stye is deserted by the grubbing lady and her grunting progeny, who are too fond of an occasional repast in the once-cultivated garden to remain in their proper abode; the listless turkeys and contented half-fatted geese live at large and on the publick; but the turkeys, with all their shyness and modesty, have the best of it—for they mount the ill-built stacks and select the grain a plaisir.

"Give you good morrow, Mr. Philip; we have had showery weather lately."

"Och, all manner o' joy to ye, my lady, and sure ye'll walk in and sit down; my woman will be proud to see ye. I'm sartin we'll have the rain soon agin, for its every where, like bad luck; and my throat's sore wid hurishing thim pigs out o' the garden; sorra'a thing can I do all day for watching them."

"Why do you not mend the door of the stye?"

"True for ye, ma'am dear, so I would—if I had the nails, and I've been threaten'g to step down to Mickey Bow, the smith, to ask him to see about it."

"I hear you've had a fine crop of wheat, Philip."

"Thank God for all things! You may say that; we had, my lady, a fine crop—but I have always the hight of ill luck somehow; upon my sowkins (and that's the hardest oath I swear) the turkeys have had the most of it; but I mean to see about setting it up safe tomorrow."

"But, Philip, I thought you sold the wheat, standing, to the steward of the big house."

"It was all as one as sould, only its a bad world, madam dear, and I've no luck. Says the steward to me, says he, 'I like to do things like a man of business; so, Mr. Garraty, just draw up a bit of an agreement that you deliver over the wheat-field to me on such a day, standing as it is, for such a sum, and I'll sign it for ye and thin there can be no mistake, only let me have it by this day week.' Well, to be sure, I came home full o' my good luck, and I tould the wife: and, on the strength of it, she must have a new gown. 'And sure,' says she, 'Miss Hennessy is just come from Dublin wid a shop-full o' goods, and, on account that she's my brother's sister-in-law's first cousin, she'll let me have the first sight o' the things, and I can take my pick—and ye'll have plenty of time to see about the agreement tomorrow.' Well, I don't know how it was, but the next day we had no paper, nor ink, nor pens in the house; I meant to send the gosson to Miss Hennessy's for all, but forgot the pens. So when I was seeing about the 'greement, I bethought of the old gander, and while I was pulling as beautiful a pen as ever ye laid ye'er two eyes upon out of his wing, he tattered my hand with his bill in such a manner that sorra' a pen I could hold for three days. Well, one thing or another put it off for ever so long, and at last I wrote it out like print, and takes it myself to the steward. 'Good evening to you, Mr. Garraty,' says he; 'Good evening kindly, sir,' says I, 'and I hope the woman that owns ye and all ye'er good family's well.' 'All well, thank ye, Mr. Garraty,' says he. 'I've got the 'greement here, sir,' says I, pulling it out, as I thought; but, behold ye, I only cocht the paper it was wrapt in, to keep it from the dirt of the tobacco that was loose in my pocket for want of a box (saving ye'er presence;) so I turned what little bits o' things I had in it out, and there was a great hole that ye might drive all the parish rats through at the bottom—which the wife promised to see about mending as good as six months before. Well, I saw the sneer of his ugly mouth, (for he's an Englishman,) and I turned it off with a laugh, and said air-holes were comfortable in hot weather, and sich jokes, and that I'd go home and make another 'greement. 'Greement for what?' says he, laying down his grate outlandish pipe, 'Whew! may be you don't know,' says I. 'Not I,' says he. 'The wheat field,' says I. 'Why,' says he 'didn't I tell you then that you must bring the 'greement to me by that day week, and that was, by the same token, (pulling out a red memorandum book out of his pocket,) let me see—exactly this day three weeks. Do you think, Mr. Garraty,' he goes on, 'that when ye didn't care to look after ye'er own interests, and I offering so fair for the field, that I was going to wait upon you? I don't lose my papers in the Irish fashion.' Well, that last set me up; and so I axed him if it was the pattern of his English breeding, and one word brought on another, and all the blood in my body rushed into my fist, and I had the ill luck to knock him down; and, the coward, what does he do but takes the law o' me, and I was cast, and lost the sale of the wheat, and was ordered to pay ever so much money: well, I didn't care to pay it then, but gave an engagement, and I meant to see about it, but forgot; and all in a giffy came a thing they call an execution, and, to stop the cant, I was forced to borrow money from that tame negur the exciseman, who'd sell the sowl out of his grandmother for sixpence (if, indeed, there ever was a sowl in the family) and it's a terrible case to be paying interest for it still."

"But, Philip, you might give up or dispose of part of your farm. I know you could get a good sum for that rich meadow by the river."

"True for ye, ma'am dear—and I've been seeing about it for a long time—but, somehow, I have no luck. Just as ye came up I was thinking to myself that the gale day is passed, and all one as before, yara a pin'sworth have I for the rint, and the land-lord wants it as bad as I do, though it's a shame to say that of a jintleman; for just as he was seeing about some ould custodium, or something of the sort, that had been hanging over the estate ever since he came to it, the sheriff's officers put executions in the house; and it is very sorrowful for both of us, if I may make bould to say so: for I am sartin he'll be racking me for money and, indeed, the ould huntsman tould me as much: but I must see about it; not, indeed, that its much good, for I've no luck."

"Let me beg of you, Philip, not to take such an idea into your head; do not lose a moment, you will be utterly ruined if you do; why not apply to your father in law, he is able to assist you; for at present, you only suffer from temporary embarrassment."

"True for ye, that's good advice, my lady; and by the blessing of God, I'll see about it."

"Then go directly, Philip."

"Directly—I can't ma'am dear, on account of the pigs; and sorra a one I have but myself to keep them out of the cabbages; for I let the woman and the grawls go to the pattern at Killaun; its little pleasure they see, the creaturs."

"But your wife did not hear the huntsman's story?"

"Och, aye did she; but, unless she could give me a sheaf o' bank notes, where would be the good of her staying—but I'll see about it."

"Immediately, then, Philip: think upon the ruin that may come—nav, that must come; if you neglect this matter. Your wife, too—your family, reduced from comfort to starvation—your home desolate."

"Aye, my lady, don't be after breaking my heart entirely; thank God I have seven as fine shabulugh children as ever peeled pratee, and all under twelve years ould; and sure I'd lay down my life tin times for every one o' them; and tomorrow for sartin—no—tomorrow—the hurling; I can't tomorrow; but the day after, if I'm a living man, I'll see about it."

Poor Philip! his kindly feelings were valueless, because of his unfortunate habit. Would that this were the only example I could produce of the ill effects of that dangerous little sentence—"I'll see about it." Oh that the sons and daughters of the fairest island that ever heaved its green boom above the surface of the ocean, would arise and be doing what is to be done, and never again rest contented with—"SEEKING ABOUT IT."

THE TRAVELLER.

THE DEAD SEA.

(Concluded.)

Whilst we were slowly riding along, wrapt up in mute meditation on its ancient glories, our Bedouins were not idle. They had observed a party of Arabs on the opposite side, prowling about, and instantly rode back in great alarm, and desired us to keep closer ranks. It turned out, however, to be no nothing more serious than one of the usual encounters. On riding up, we found two or three naked men attempting to recall their horses from this side of the river. The sheep of their rivals had crossed over in return, and a parley ensued on the propriety of seizing them. "They belong to the Vizier," says one of the disputants. "If they belonged to the Sultan," retaliated the enemy, "it is all the same to us: we are the Sultan, and we will seize them as we like." After admiring this specimen of Bedouin law, which differs little in theory or practice from that of our own good Border ancestors, when "the strong hand uppermost" was the beginning, middle, and end of all jurisprudence, we rode on, soon reached the embouchure of the river, bearing south-east, and caught the first broad view of the Dead Sea.† The sea is discoloured by the waters of the Jordan for about two hundred yards, and, for at least four hundred feet up the stream, the water tastes extremely salt and brackish. The south side is covered with a quantity of low shrubs and about one hundred yards from the river, a low line of sand separates its debordemens from the sea. Here, also, are a few trees, the greater part shrunk up and withered. We now proceeded to the shore. The view from this point is singularly striking. The mountains of Moab on the east, and the west, form a vast basin. They appear, generally speaking, to run parallel

* The motto of the armorial bearings of the O'Briens.

† Bahr, a generic name for any large expanse of water—river, lake, or sea. Thus, the Tiberias and Asphaltes may be called "small," as the Hellespont has been called "broad." Before we pronounce on the propriety of the epithet, we must ascertain to what it is referred.

—are of the same character of soil—the western lower than the eastern chain—their forms much broken, affecting the conical, and running down in ridges, shivered and pointed, to the water. In some places they break off bluffly and unexpectedly, and are cloven by earthquake or time in perpendicular precipices. The colour of the eastern range, somewhat interrupted here and there by deep valleys, is of a dun red; no symptoms of wood, and very little of herbage, are to be seen. Each of these valleys are traceable by their openings towards the sea, and almost every opening is consecrated, in some manner or other, in the pages of sculpture. On the west, the hills stand like a confused crowd of tumult, ploughed and torn and slashed by the action of inward fire,* but with a great resemblance to each other, and of a whitish, chalky soil, here and there greened over with a scant and sickly herbage. A very near exemplification of the same appearances may be seen both in the neighbourhood of the Solfatara at Naples, and close to the city of Sienna. No plains of any extent intervene between the mountains and the sea. The sandy plains of Jericho stretch off, blank and waste, to the north. We sat down for a time, in silent astonishment, and gazed, strongly impressed by the sight, on the universal desolation which weighed like a curse on every thing around us. We were seated on a withered trunk, which had been carried down by the river and afterwards rejected by the sea. Large fragments of a similar kind lay scattered around us, half buried in the slimy sand; beyond these were long crusts, or shells of salt, glistening and cracking under the feet of our horses, that were wandering about in search of some sour herbage, and, finding none, had at last approached to where we were placed. A few sickly plants, half smothered in the mud and salt of the frequent inundations, made a sort of wood. Near drooped one or two squalid knots of tulips, mixed with glaring yellow flowers; and we heard, from time to time, the melancholy song of a few lonesome birds on the stunted trees. After a short repose, we stripped and rushed into the waters. They bore us up with great force as we advanced. We took precautions not to wet the head. The travellers who have preceded us had suffered from neglect in this respect. The water seemed tolerably clear until taken up in the hand, when it looked oily, and resembled brandy when first mixed with water. The general hue was a dead palish green, approaching to blue; the bottom slippery and slimy, cleft strongly up and down for several feet together, and here and there scooped and sunk into pits and holes. This slime, on the shore, assumed the appearance and consistency of stone. The sensation on leaving the water was disagreeable in the extreme. It did not, indeed, produce that contraction of the skin mentioned by most writers, but we felt instead, a clammy, oily feeling, not unlike honey half washed off. I saw no asphaltum floating on the surface of the sea; but we picked up some particles (the largest not longer than an inch) and perfectly black, on the shore. The waters tasted particularly salt, bitter, and poignant, and left a strong, sharp, stinging sensation on the tongue, nose, and eyes. The salt deposit, too, on our beards and skin was very considerable and most unpleasant. The whole scene was one of utter desolation. Not a human being was visible in the neighbourhood; not a single symptom or vestige of man. The few struggling birds I have mentioned, and the fragments of a few shells in the sand, were the only evidences of life. After an interval of about an hour, we resumed our journey. On leaving the lake, and crossing some brackish water at no great distance from the shore, we took a N. W. direction, and re-entered on the same description of desert mountain we had been traversing the day before. Here we dismissed our Jericho guard of honour, and sending on Sheikh Mohammed (who, notwithstanding our prohibition, had, by a circuitous route, come up with us and joined us) to the Convent of St Saba, to prepare for our reception, we continued our wanderings amongst the mountains. They were truly such: up and down the beds of torrents, with guides as ignorant as ourselves, striding on in a slung trot by our side, and every moment vociferating for help and water. The torrents were dry, and the wells distant, and the day advanced, and the whole party tired, and the greater part out of humour. In the height of these disappointments, we at last chanced on a truly scriptural-looking well, covered with a largemishapen stone. The rush to the spot was most exhilarating; the stone was hurled aside and all bent down to drink in a moment. In the midst of this good fortune and enjoyment Sheikh Mohammed entered our ring with his long black face, and reported, in doleful guise, that his applications at the Convent had been totally ineffectual. "Those same sons of infidels," said he, "the reverend fathers of Saint Saba, had refused all admittance, without a firman from the Dragoman of the Greeks at Jerusalem; had we been sons of kings, they would not, at this hour, receive us." We were sore wroth at the refusal, but we could not help thinking afterwards the monks were quite in the right. There could not be a more villainous face to send, by way of a letter of recommendation, than our friend Mohammed's; besides, the monks, after the manner of their brethren in Europe during the middle ages, had many an account still to settle with their troublesome neighbours. Mohammed kept his tribe constantly marauding in the neighbourhood, and the Punick faith and false pledges of these freebooters had been often experienced, and were well remembered. In this dilemma we held over the well a hasty council. Mohammed sitting on the stone, with his legs crossed, and his hand under his chin, quietly observed the changes of our countenance. After various suggestions, he offered to conduct us to the camp of one of his acquaintances in the neighbourhood, where, if our "Highnesses" liked it, we might sleep for the night. There was not much choice. We had only to select a bed on a rock with a tent over us, or a bed on a rock without any tent at all. The danger was equal. We might be slain any where; and as for robbery, we had nothing about us, "cantabit vacuum," &c. we were not worth the risk or the pains. In about half an hour we arrived at the camp. It consisted of a few black tents (the tents of Kedar) drawn up on the shelving side of a sand-hill, immediately over a wadi, or the ravine of a torrent. We were received by a crowd of young turbulent Bedouins, mostly armed, amidst the barking of dogs, the screams of children, and the emphatic panegyrics of Mohammed. We spread our rugs, and slept satisfactorily, and soundly enough, until morning.

The next day we visited St. Saba. After some slight demur at the outer wicket, of no consequence to any who has travelled amongst Austrians, we were admitted by the superior, a Syrian, who conducted us through the Monastery with salaams, and a profusion of apologies. We were not Hadgis, so lightly to be despised; and then some of our party could speak Greek. The church is gaudy rather than gay: the whole impannelled with sprawling paintings of various epochs. In some of the more recent, groping attempts were visible at chiaroscuro—an alarming innovation amongst the orthodox, if we are to trust to the anecdote of Titian. The subjects which covered so much wood were of the usual kind—armies of gaunt and ghostly-visaged saints, legends, disjointed portions of Scripture, history, &c. Amongst the latter we noticed "The Last Judgement." It resembled a similar production, I presume by the same master, at the Armenian Convent at Jerusalem. They are painted much as men make tables and chairs. The superior stood in ecstasy before its beauties, and did not spare us one. On one side was Heaven, and then on the other Hell—well railed off from each other certainly, but rather too close for any comfort. The graves in front were yielding up their dead; and there was a gulf on the left hand of the Judge ready to receive them the moment they should appear. This gulf, on coming closer, was perceived to be an ill favoured beast, with its mouth open, and with an immense appetite. The most conspicuous sinners (the Jewish High Priests) stood by, ready to be eaten up. The devil looked on, dressed in his ordinary costume. On the other side stood St. Peter, turning reluctantly the key of the celestial Jerusalem (not much more inviting than the terrestrial); and above, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the first literally opening his bosom for the reception of the hosts of the faithful, who were climbing up from below. All this was as coarsely executed as it was grossly conceived; and does no great honour, either to the pencil, or the imagination of the good fathers. We noticed a few books in the church, and about three hundred volumes in a small chamber above. I saw some complete MSS. of the Gospels, handsomely illuminated on vellum, though of no great age; a fine MS. of St. John Chrysostom, another of St. John Climacus, and several others of the Ascetics. The only profane author which attracted my attention was a Cyropædia of the thirteenth century. The printed books were principally bad editions of devotional works, and a few classics from Europe. From the library, if such it could be termed, we passed to the court below. Here is to be seen the chapel of St. Saba, a small domical building—the body of the Saint, somehow or other, has travelled, with several others, to Europe. To the east of this chapel there is another cut in the rock. The first chamber is supported by regularly shaped piers, but the ceiling is left in the rough, neither painted nor plastered, and altogether without the usual decorations. The second room is smaller, and has no other merit than that of being the shrine where repose the bones of fourteen thousand martyrs. They are shown by torchlight, through a narrow iron grating. Four of the skulls are exposed by way of specimen, close to this entrance, in a sort of wooden trough: I questioned the superior rather inconveniently on that number, and on the cause of their death. He turned a broad, excommunicating stare upon me, without answering a single word. Every one who falls here, be he Christian or Moslem, is sure to be a martyr: whether the cause be a sheep, or a tenet of faith, it is very much the same. On leaving the chapel, we descended by a variety of doors and stairs, and at last by a ladder, into the brook Kedron, upon which St. Saba stands; and crossing it, which we easily did, for it was almost dry, we had a very striking view of the Convent. It hangs immediately over the bed of the torrent, and its irregular architecture follows the irregularities and inclinations of its exceedingly steep sides. The walls are high and solid—an adequate defence against the plunderers who infest the adjacent country. The church forms the centre of the mass. It is supported externally by heavy buttresses, and crowned by a dome. Two lofty square towers, one within, the other without the walls, and a long line of battlements give it the appearance of a fortress. Below, a flight of grass-grown, disjointed steps, wind into the torrent. On all sides around are sheets of purple-looking rocks, dry and bare, dotted by deserted cells, some painfully dug into the clefts of the rocks, others loosely overhanging the precipices, and apparently ready every instant, with the entire ledge from which they are excavated, to crumble and crash below. There is no vegetation to rest the eye on, but clumps of wild tulips and rye-grass starting from the ragged cliffs, and a single palm-tree in the court of the convent, the leaves of which just peep above one of the embrasures. All this contrasting with the gloomy glare of the white walls, the silent blue skies above, and the dreary bed of the torrent below, incumbered with huge masses of dry rock, &c. gives one of the most impressive pictures of monastic solitude and secret penance which the travelled eye can well behold. The bell tolled as we were silently gazing on this scene, which completed the effect. We now adjourned to the divan, or parlour of the monastery, and fared sumptuously, on caviar, salad, cheese, and Bethlehem white wine. Heaps of small loaves were preparing near, for the pilgrims and the Arabs—the daily price which the monks pay for their forbearance to these Cerberus of the desert, there were about forty or fifty monks, at the time of our visit, in the convent. They dated the origin of the building so far back as twelve hundred years, an antiquity to which few similar institutions in Europe can ascend. Their original institution was extremely rigorous. The superior shook his head at the degeneracy of the moderns;

* Most of the names of the five cities bear allusion to these appearances, or to the great event: they seem to have been given after it. Bura, burning; Adam, red earth; Gomerrah, rebel, &c.

though to a less fastidious beholder, their pale and meagre physiognomy is satisfactory and penetrating enough. We left the Convent by a difficult ascent through an iron gate, and quitting the brook, continued our way back through the mountains to Jerusalem. On our route we met with a band of Greek and other pilgrims, amounting nearly to seventy or eighty, the greater part comfortably mounted. No women accompanied the caravan; they are not permitted to enter the sanctuary. These visits, at this time of the year, are frequent, and at all times acceptable. They break the dead blank, provide caviar for the monks, and fat purses for the Pasha. Towards evening we again saw the Holy City, majestically glittering in the setting sun, on its ancient mountain throne. We proceeded slowly up, through lanes of verdure, luxuriant hedges, groups of olives, mulberries, fig-trees, &c. to the gate of Jaffa, congratulating ourselves on having escaped the fate of the Levite, who went down from Jerusalem, though we had also passed through the hands of thieves. But we had other perils environing us, very nearly as bad as the valley of Adummim. The Bedouin Mohammed rode beside us.

THE GATHERER.

"HE, THAT DIGGETH A PIT, SHALL FALL THEREIN."

The following remarkable incident, which, we are assured, happened in this city some years since, has never, to our knowledge, been related in print. A thoughtless young man went to an undertaker's, and ordered a coffin for Mrs. —, to be sent to a certain number and street, which he specified. The young man possessed the appearance and manners of a gentleman of respectability; and the undertaker, not dreaming in the least of any deception, repaired to the place specified, with the "narrow house," according to order. On ringing the bell, a genteel looking female came to the door, and was asked if Mrs. Such-a-one lived there—or had lived there. "She lives here now," was the reply; "I am she." "You!" exclaimed the astonished undertaker—"and you are not dead then! I was ordered to bring this coffin for you." "For me!" ejaculated the lady, in a voice of mingled terror and astonishment, and fainted away. So strange an incident produced the impression which might naturally be expected in a mind of ordinary sensibility, and it was some time before she recovered from its effects.

But the young man, who, in a thoughtless moment, had committed so rash and cruel a piece of folly, did not so easily escape the consequences. The effect it produced on the lady, and the still more disastrous result which might have followed it, preyed on his mind. He became melancholy, pined in grief, fell into the consumption, and in little more than a year required in reality the sad office which he had undertaken for the lady in a mere joke; and it so happened, that he was buried in the identical coffin he had bespoken for her.

[N. Y. Constellation.]

A GOOD FELLOW.

When we hear of a person who takes a pride "in setting the table in a roar,"—whose whole thoughts, his day dreams, and night visions, are fixed upon guzzling and swilling "healths five fathoms deep,"—whose belly is his god—who lives, moves, and has his being, in dinner and supper parties—who can swallow six bottles, and take his share of the seventh, and after all floor his companions with as much ease as the champion of England—who gets drunk every night and has the blues every morning—we invariably say, "This is such a man whom the world calls a good fellow." We never think of such a one, but we form "in our mind's eye" the embodiment of a toper, with a face like a "nor-west" moon, a nose like a carrot smothered in radishes, large saucer eyes staring from the head, surrounded with a peculiar sort of rheum, resembling as much as it is possible for such eyes to resemble, an antiquated castle of the 12th century, surrounded with a moat, a mouth decorated in front with several particles of snuff, of that particular sort called Blackguard, and lined within with two rows of tusks, which have evidently taken into "the sere, the yellow leaf,"—and a chin garnished with several cuts, whose summits are crowned with a putrescent greenness, like the surface of a standing pool. His linens might once have been white, but when, is lost in the remoteness of antiquity. His cloth—originally sable, is now neither black, nor blue, nor brown, but partakes so much of hue of these different colours, that it would puzzle an antiquary to discover which was the original. Such a picture, "disguise it as thou wilt" is associated with our ideas, of "a good fellow" or "a good soul." When the husk is so "villainously unclean" what must the kernel be? We would hesitate to say that such a man has a soul at all; why call him then "a good soul?" If people would only examine into the fitness of the title, for those who, in common parlance, are called good fellows, they would perhaps, give them a name directly opposite. We, who are in the habit of probing names as well as causes, to the bottom, and delight in calling things by their right names, would do so at once; and certainly the habitual toper—the sneaking tippler—the forenoon dram drinker—the seducer of men's wives and daughters—the breaker of the subbath—the dissolute and idle, et hoc genus omne, are not those to whom we would give the name of "good fellow."

CHRISTMAS.

More than eighteen hundred years have gone by, since the Son of God descended, to redeem a fallen race. He did not come in the effulgence of supernal glory clad in dazzling robes, and attended by cherubim. The heavenly being assumed a mortal form—the infant Saviour was "wrapped in swaddling clothes, and laid in a manger." On this return of this natal day, the mind reverts to the sublime and affecting event, which marked his career. The flocks of Bethlehem are at rest, guarded by the watchful shepherds, and the Angel of the Lord descends with his glad tidings,—a celestial host suddenly appear, and exclaim "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace and good will towards men!" A star appears in the East, and the wise men are guided by its light, to the abiding place of him who was "born King of the Jews." We hear the voice of maternal anguish, sorrowing for the youngest-born, slaughtered by the cruel Herod. We see the Baptist emerging from the Judean desert, and we hear his awful voice, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make his paths straight!" We see the dove coming down through the silvery cloud, and we hear the voice proclaiming "this is my beloved son." We behold the transfiguration on the high mountain; the triumphant entry into Jerusalem; the sorrowful prostration in the garden of Gethsemane; the kiss of the betrayer. We see the Son of Man standing in solemn silence before his accusers; we see him nailed to the cross, and we hear his last cry of mortal agony, "I am sabachthani!" A fearful scene succeeds; the vail of the temple is rent; the earth heaves, the sheeted dead arise from their sepulchres, and walk about the streets of Jerusalem! A little while, and we behold him who was crucified, restored to life, and attended by his disciples. He gives them his last charge, and ascends to heaven, his great work of salvation being accomplished.

How should man show his gratitude for such boundless beneficence; what return can he make for the "agony and bloody sweat," of the Redeemer, who bore the pangs of death, and lay down in the dust of the grave, for him? He can make no adequate return, the great debt of gratitude cannot be cancelled; all that he can do is to govern his actions by the principles of that sublime Being, whom the earth will not behold again, till the great day of doom, when he shall come in the clouds of heaven. SERVING A WRIT ON A PARSON.

In one of the eastern towns—no matter precisely where, nor precisely when—a gentleman of the bar was about committing matrimony. The company had assembled, the parson was in attendance, and the bridegroom rose to hand his reverence the certificate of publication, according to the law, in such cases made and provided. As a lawyer he could do wonders before a bench and jury; but this was a new case, he was sadly embarrassed, and after fumbling awhile in his pocket, handed the parson the wrong paper. His reverence glanced his eye over it, and with a good-natured smile, told him he believed he had made a mistake, and handed it back. It happened to be a writ! The poor lawyer was now doubly embarrassed, and fumbling again in his pocket, handed out another paper. After looking at this, the parson smiled again, but seeing the perturbation of the matrimonial candidate, forbore to notice a second mistake, and proceeded to tie the knot. On the morrow the happy bridegroom was much surprised to find this second certificate returned to him, with the request of the parson to forward the true one. He opened it, and found it was his TAILOR'S BILL! [ib.]

EPITHETS.

The meaning of the word Wretch is one not generally understood. It was originally, and is now, in some parts of England, used as a term of the softest and fondest tenderness. This is not the only instance in which words in their present general acceptance bear a very opposite meaning to what they did in Shakspeare's time. The word Wench, formerly, was not used in that low and vulgar acceptance it is at present. Damsel was the appellation of young ladies of quality, and Dame a title of distinction. Knave once signified a servant; and in an early translation of the New Testament, instead of 'Paul the Servant,' we read 'Paul the Knave of Jesus Christ.' On the other hand, the word Companion, instead of being the honourable synonyme of Associate, occurs in the play of Othello, with the same contemptuous meaning which we now affix, in its abusive sense, to the word 'Fellow'—for Emilia, perceiving that some secret villain had aspersed the character of the virtuous Desdemona, thus indignantly exclaims:—

'O, Heaven! that such Companions thou'dst unfold,
And put in every honest hand a whip,
To lash the rascals naked through the world!'

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1829.

☞ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

☞ A multiplicity of duties must plead our excuse for the apparent want of attention to this department of our paper recently, and particularly this week. Much of our time, during the past week, has been occupied in making improvements (which we trust will hereafter not be unnoticed) in the mechanical appearance of the Record. Our paper will hereafter be issued at an earlier hour than recently, to subscribers in the city, and those at a distance are informed that in future their papers will be forwarded by the earliest mails.

THE THEATRE. Mr. Hackett performed at the theatre in this city on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings last, in two of his favourite Yankee characters—Solomon Swoop in the comedy of Jonathan in England, and Industrious Doolittle, in the new play called The Times, or Life in New-York. The latter character was, we believe, written to be sustained by Mr. Hackett. Those who have seen this gentleman upon the stage can alone form a proper idea of the entertainment his performances afford. He is a Yankee by birth, and there is an indescribable something in and about Yankeeism, of which we shall leave our readers to form their own notions.

Some novelties have been produced at the theatre this week, but our business has required so much of our attention that we find it impossible to speak of them. The King and Deserter is said to be very attractive.

It will be seen by the following extracts from the National Egis, published at Worcester, Massachusetts, that anti-masonry is considered as disreputable in New England as it is in this state. In fact, men of respectability in all quarters manifest a very creditable solicitude to be free from the suspicion of having the slightest connexion with the anti-masonick anti-religious, and anti-decent speculation; and it is only by an unauthorised and unwarrantable use of the names of gentlemen, that the abandoned fellows who alone can profit by confusion are able to keep up any thing like an "excitement." The history of parties does not furnish an example of beggary equal to that which accompanies anti-ism in every region—it has no respectability, save what it steals from those who heartily despise it.

ANTI-MASONICK.—It is with great pleasure that we comply with the request contained in the following communication from John L. Boylston, Esq. of Princeton. We do it the more readily as it furnishes additional evidence of the judgment which public opinion has already pronounced upon the subject.

Mr. Editor.—In your paper of the 16th inst. I observed my appointment by the Anti-Masonic Convention lately held at Worcester, as one of the delegates to the General Anti-Masonic Convention to be held in the city of Boston, the last of this month. I wish therefore through the same channel, to communicate to the public my undivided sentiments and convictions upon this spurious effusion of party excitement, and will thank you to give them a place in your paper.

As to the Fraternity of Free Masons, their Constitution, rules, regulations and practices, I have read and learnt little but what I conceived to be a partial statement and for purposes that I could not comprehend; but from what I do know of its members, among whom are many of my friends, with whom I am in the habit, daily, of reciprocating the common courtesies of life, I have never had occasion to suspect that the institution had any operative effect to impair or destroy the harmony and peace of society. It is true I am not thoroughly convinced of the utility of the institution, nor am I convinced of any evil in it; therefore am not prepared to join the popular hue and cry against it, and shall not attend any convention on the subject—especially as I have no purpose, object, prejudice or interest in this salubrious effervescence.

JOHN LANE BOYLSTON.

Princeton, Dec. 18, 1829.

Frederick W. Bottom, esq. of Southbridge, informs us that he positively declines serving as a Delegate to the anti-masonick State Convention to be held in Boston.

We understand from the most respectable authority that the Rev. Mr. Allen of Bolton, who was also selected as a delegate, declines accepting the appointment and will not attend the State Convention—Mr. Allen is not a Mason.

A friend of the Rev. Mr. Josiah Clarke of Rutland, has requested us to state that he declines the appointment of Delegate to the State Convention.

The editor of The Craftsman, published at Rochester offers the following literary premiums:

For the second best, do. $20.

Anti-Masonry. The Canal of Intelligence, published at Norwich, in this State, has given up its opposition to masonry, and is to be conducted hereafter by Mr. Park Benjamin, a young man of distinguished talents. We have a kindly feeling of the late conductor of the Canal, but, after all, we are pleased to find that anti-masonry meets with little encouragement in Connecticut. We care nothing about the Masonick Institution, for we are "not a mason, and probably never shall be"—but we are willing to believe, that Masons are as good as the rest of mankind. We consider them neither a whit better or worse than other people. Anti-masons are greatly troubled, because their opponents wish to keep their own secrets—but that is a matter, which never troubles us. If Masons, or any other body of men, think fit to keep their affairs to themselves, they may do so, for what we care—we have concerns enough of our own, without troubling ourselves with what is none of our business. We have a particular contempt for all those grannies, whether in petticoats or breeches, who make it the great end of their lives to go about squinting into dark corners, like Peter Pindar's magpie into the narrow-bone, and reporting their discoveries for the edification of their neighbours.

We are told that masons are a set of desperadoes, "bound by their very oaths of office to vindicate murder and treason." Who are they, that assert this? Nine-tenths of them are men, who, for years previous to the supposed death of Morgan, had been zealous supporters of the Masonick institution. They supported Masonry as long as it was popular—lived for years, according to their own confession, under an obligation to justify murder—and finally, left their society just at the lucky moment when a little money was to be made by opening it. Shall we, on the testimony of such men, condemn our friends, our fathers, and our brothers, with whom we have lived from our childhood, and whose purity of character is as evident to us as any thing earthly can be? God forbid. We are quite willing to see Masonry opposed even to annihilation—but not after fashion in which it is now opposed.

MONROE GENERAL SESSIONS.—The December term concluded its session on Saturday. Among the causes which excited most interest was that of J. B. Luce, one of the fraternity of "Botanick Physicians," who was indicted for practising contrary to the law in such cases made and provided. He was convicted after a trial of two days. Sentence, fifty dollars fine and thirty days imprisonment.

Thurlow Weed of the Antimasonic Enquirer, indicted for a libel on the publisher of this paper, actually swore off his trial on account of the absence of Judge Gardner, now holding a Circuit in Erie, whom he alleges to be a material witness for his defence! Comment is unnecessary. He was held to bail, himself and a surety in $500 each.

The noted Israel J. Richardson, a leader of the Southwick party and would-be Congress-man from the Ontario district, who caused us to be indicted last summer for an alleged libel on him in alluding to the indecencies proven against him on a former trial, did not appear to prosecute! Perhaps, like Don Quixote in the case of Sancho, he fancies, "the less the matter is stirred, the better."

[Rochester Republican.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY.—The county court, at its late session, appointed the Hon. D. D. Barnard, (late member of congress,) District Attorney of this county, in place of the Hon. Addison Gardner, appointed circuit judge. Mr. Barnard, though neither a mason nor an advocate of masonry, has from the earliest day deprecated the perversion to political purposes of the excitement against that institution. His appointment is wormwood to the Southwickites, to whom he has rendered himself obnoxious by his independent course during the excitement which has unhappily distracted this region. Mr. B. was predecessor of Mr. Gardner as district attorney, but resigned on being elected to congress.

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED.

The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgements for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength, and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the sackings. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding house keepers—to the masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee, now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 163 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

POETRY.

The following poem is taken from "The Annulet, a Christian and Literary Remembrancer, for 1830." The London Literary Gazette observes that "though in parts it bears a rather too close resemblance to Coleridge's Ancient Mariner, all the sentiments that relate to the child, as well as many other passages, are so eminently pathetic and beautiful, that we have no hesitation in classing this composition with the Eugene Aram* of Mr. Hood, last year, as one of those productions which will survive long after the mediocrities which fill the larger proportion of the Annulet's pages are forgotten. Where the thoughts are so truly fine and poetical, it is almost invidious to regret a certain want of polish; yet the alteration of a few words and phrases would have greatly improved the effect of this spirited tale of the sea, whether well read or well declaimed."

AN OLD MAN'S STORY.

By Mary Howitt.

There was an old and quiet man,
And by a fire sat he,
"And now," he said, "to you I'll tell
A dismal thing that once befell
A ship upon the sea.
"Tis five and-fifty years gone by,
Since, from the River Plate,
A young man in a home-bound ship,
I sailed as second mate.
She was a trim, stout-timbered ship,
And built for stormy seas,
A lovely thing on the wave was she,
With her canvas set so gallantly
Before a steady breeze.
For forty days, like a winged thing,
She went before the gale,
Nor all that time was slackened speed,
Turned helm, or altered sail.
She was a laden argosy
Of wealth from the Spanish main,
And the treasure boards of a Portuguese
Returning home again.
An old and silent man was he,
And his face was yellow and lean;
In the golden lands of Mexico
A miner he had been.
His body was wasted, bent and bowed,
And amid his gold he lay—
Amid iron chests that were bound with brass,
And he watched them night and day.
No word he spoke to any on board,
And his step was heavy and slow,
And all men deemed that an evil life
He led in Mexico.
But that year—on the two high seas,
As the ship went smoothly on,
It chanced in the silent second watch,
I sat on the deck alone;
And I heard, from among those iron chests,
A sound like a dyfuz groan.
I started to my feet—and lo!
The captain stood by me,
And he bore a body in his arms,
And dropped it in the sea.
I heard it drop into the sea,
With a heavy splashing sound,
And I saw the captain's bloody hands
As he quickly turned him round;
And he drew in his breath when he saw
Like one convulsed, whom the withering awe
Of a spectre dash astound.
But I saw his white and palish lips,
And the stare of his ghastly eye,
When he turned in hurried haste away,
Yet he had no power to fly;
He was chained to the deck with his heavy guilt,
And the blood that was not dry.
"Tis a cursed thing," said I "to kill
That old man in his sleep!
And the plagues of the sea will come from him
Ten thousand fathoms deep!
And the plagues of the storm will follow us,
For heaven's lightning hath heard!"
Still the captain's eye was fixed on me,
But he answered never a word.
And he slowly lifted his bloody hand
His ashing eyes to shade—
But the blood that was wet did freeze his soul,
And he shrank like one afraid.
And even then, that very hour,
The wind dropped, and a spell
Was on the ship, was on the sea,
And we lay for weeks, now wearily,
Where the old man's body fell.
I told no one within the ship
That horrid deed of sin;
For I saw the hand of God at work,
And the punishment begin.
And when they spoke of the murdered man,
And the El Dorado board,
They all surmised he had walked in dreams,
And had fallen overboard.
But I alone, and the murderer,
That dreadful thing did know,
How he lay in his sin a murdered man,
A thousand fathoms low.
And many days, and many more,
Came on, and lagging, and
And the heavy waves of that sleeping sea
Were dark, like molten lead.

* "The Dream of Eugene Aram," was published in the Record of January 3, 1829.

And not a breeze came, east or west,
And burning was the sky,
And stifling was each breath we drew
Of the air, so hot and dry.
Oh me! there was a smell of death
Hung round us night and day;
And I dared not look in the sea below
Where the old man's body lay.
In his cabin, alone, the captain kept,
And he bolted fast the door,
And up and down the sailors walked,
And wished that calm was o'er.
The captain's son was on board with us,
A fair child, seven years old,
With a merry look that all men loved,
And a spirit kind and bold.
I loved the child, and I took his hand
And made him kneel and pray
That the crime for which the calm was sent
Might be purged clean away.
For I thought that God would hear his prayer,
And set the vessel free:—
For a dreadful thing it was to lie
Upon that charnel sea.
Ye, I told him not wherefore he prayed,
Nor why the calm was sent,
I would not give that knowledge dark
To a soul so innocent.
At length I saw a little cloud,
Arise in that sky of flame,
A little cloud, but it grew and grew,
And blackened as it came.
And we saw the sea beneath its track
Grow dark as the frowning sky,
And water spouts, with a rushing sound
Like giants passed us by.
And all around, 'twixt sky and sea,
A hollow wind did blow!
And the waves were heaved from the ocean depths,
And the ship rocked to and fro.
I knew it was that fierce death-calm
Its horrid hold undoing,
And I saw the plagues of wind and storm
Their missioned work pursuing.
There was a yell in the gathering winds,
A groan in the heaving sea,
And the captain rushed from the hold below,
But he durst not look on me:
He seized each rope with a madman's haste,
And he set the helm to go,
And every sail he crowded on,
While the furious winds did blow.
Away they went, like autumn leaves
Before the tempest's rout,
And the naked masts with a crash came down,
And the wild ship tossed about.
The men to spars and splintered boards
Clung till their strength was gone,
And I saw them from their feeble hold
Washed over, one by one.
And 'mid the creaking timber's din,
And the roaring of the sea,
I heard the dismal, drowning cry
Of their last agony.
There was a curse in the wind that blew,
A curse in the boiling wave;
And the captain knew that vengeance came
From the old man's ocean grave.
And I heard him say, as he sat apart,
In a hollow voice and low,
"Tis a cry of blood doth follow us,
And still doth plague us so!"
And then those heavy iron chests
With desperate strength took he,
And ten of the strongest mariners
Did cast them into the sea.
And out from the bottom of the sea
There came a hollow groan:—
The captain by the gunwale stood,
And he looked like icy stone—
And he drew in his breath with a gasping sob,
And a spasm of death came on.
And a furious boiling wave rose up,
With a rushing thundering roar,
I saw the captain fall to the deck,
But I never saw him more.
Two days before, when the storm began,
We were forty men and five,
But ere the middle of that night,
There were but two alive.
The child and I we were but two,
And he clung to me in fear;
Oh! it was pitiful to see
That meek child in his misery,
And his little prayers to hear!
At length, as if his prayers were heard,
"Tis calmer, and anon
The clear sun shone, and warm and low
A steady wind from the west did blow,
And drove us gently on.
And on we drove, and on we drove,
That fair young child and I,
But his heart was as a man's in strength,
And he uttered not a cry.
There was no bread within the wreck,
And water we had none,
Yet he murmured not, and cheered me
When my last hopes were gone;
But I saw him waste and waste away,
And his rosy cheek grow wan.
Still on we drove, I knew not where,
For many nights and days,
We were too weak to raise a sail,
Had there been one to raise.
Still on we went, as the west wind drove,
On, on, o'er the pathless tide;
And I lay in a sleep 'twixt life and death,
And the child was at my side.
It chanced, as we were drifting on
Amid the great South Sea,

An English vessel passed us by,
That was sailing cheerily;
Unheard by me, that vessel hailed,
And asked what we might be.
The young child at the cheer rose up,
And gave an answering word,
And they drew him from the drifting wreck,
As light as a bird.
They took him gently in their arms,
And put again to sea—
'Not yet! not yet!' he feebly cried,
'There was a man with me.'
Again unto the wreck they came,
Where, like one dead, I lay,
And a ship-boy small had strength enough
To carry me away.
O joy it was when sense returned
That air warm ship to see,
And to hear the child within his bed,
Speak pleasant words to me.
I thought at first that we had died,
And all our pains were o'er,
And in a blessed ship of heaven
Were sailing to its shore.
But they were human forms that knelt
Beside our bed to pray,
And men with hearts most merciful,
Did watch us night and day.
'Tis a dismal tale I had to tell,
Of wreck and wild distress,
But even then I told to none
The captain's wickedness.
For I loved the boy, and I could not cloud
His soul with a sense of shame—
'Tis an evil thing, thought I, to blast
A sinless orphan's name.
So he grew to be a man of wealth,
And of honourable name.
And in after years, when he had ships,
I sailed with him the sea.
And in all the sorrow of my life
He was a son to me.
And God hath blessed him every where
With great prosperity."

PILGRIMS OF THE WORLD.

By W. Howitt.

I see a city of the East,
A city great and wide;
The evening sunlight richly falls
On its pyramids of pride.
Its marble founts and porticoes,
Its towers and temples vast,
And its pillars of memorial tall,
Shadows of beauty cast.
The murmur of its multitudes
Is like the ocean's voice:
Yet mayest thou hear the children's cries,
That in streets and squares rejoice.
How glorious looks that antique town!
How pleasant is its din!
But the evening falls, the gates are closed,
And have shut three strangers in.
Their steps are faint, their garbs are quaint,
Their travel has been sore
With what a wild and hungry glance
They stalk by every door;
On goes the first—What cries are those?
I seem at once to hear
Rebellious shouts, despairing rage,
Wo, agony, and fear.
The second, with a muttered curse,
Down tower and house has hurried;
And the third has left a silence there
That shall outlast the world.
Mine eye is on a broad rich realm,
On pleasant fields and downs—
On heathen roads that run, like veins,
Unto a thousand towns.
What green and cattle-traversed hills!
What old majestic woods!
How lightly glide those merchant-sails
Along the gleaming floods!
But that pilgrim three!—that fearful three!
Again I see them, there!
And banners rise, and dying cries,
And darkness, and despair.
What cursed vision have I seen?
Is this the land they paced?
This—where the ruins lie in heaps
Along the wormwood waste?
This—where the wild ass snuffs the wind,
The silent ostrich stands;
And the column, like a ruined king,
Frowns proudly on the sands?
A home! there is a happy home!
An old, ancestral tower;
And blessed is the family
That peoples it this hour.
Honours their valiant fathers won,
Fair are their lands and wide;
But the love that is in their kindred souls,
That is their wealth and pride.
Now vengeance on these wandering fiends!
Hither, too, are they come!
I see them lowering at the gate,
And a shadow wraps that home.
Oh! there are tears—wild, burning tears,
Terror, and scorn, and hate;
Mad words, dark looks, and breaking hearts,
And parings desperate.
Can no one stop those wizzards' curse?
Can no one break their power?
The green boughs shrivel as they pass,
Their footsteps crush the flower.
Stand back! stand back! thou desperate man!
Wouldst thou their progress thwart?

Thou shalt have stood in Adam's bower;
Thou shalt have laid waste his heart.
Those gaunt forms round the world have gone,
Through centuries of guilt,
Hailing down what the wise have framed,
And what the mighty built.
Children of hoary Eld, they hold
This gloaming earth in fee,
While time shall stretch his weary wing
Towards the timeless sea.
Stand back! for who may cross the path
Of creatures void of breath?
Stand back! for who may dare the power
Of Sin, Decay, and Death?

THE STANDARD-BEARER.

By Allan Cunningham.

All saddled and bridled,
And booted and ready,
He stopped but to listen
One word from his lady:
"A! saddled and bridled!"
She said it in pride—
"To the war, like a victor,
Lord Edward, ye ride.
I wrought this fair standard
I give to thy trust."
Return it unsaddled,
Or lie with it in dust."
He stroked his white war horse,
He touched his sword hilt:
"These hoofs shall be moistened.
This blade shall be gilt
In blood, ere I lose it."
Of other words none
He spoke—like a sunbeam
He gleamed, and was gone.
Around his bright banner
Swords spring from their sheaths,
And the words of the war cry
Were, Victory or Death.
He rode to the combat
With princes and peers,
To the rending of corslets
And splintering of spears:
He rode to the combat
Of peasants with lords,
To the flashing of muskets
And thrusting with swords.
With his sharp sword he pointed
To lines long and large,
Cried "Down with the churls!"
And spurred to the charge.
All plumed, like young eagles,
And bright as the beams
Of the sun when he wakens,
In June, on the streamers:
All fierce as young eagles
Were, stooping, half way
Down from heaven, they come,
With scream, on their prey:
So rushed knights and nobles
On peasants and grooms,
With the sounding of trumpets
And tossing of plumes.
The death veil of battle
Aunder is torn:
Like the tempest that sports
In the valley of corn,
Death scattered their riders:
In vain have they striven;
O'er the earth, like the doves
Of the thistle, they're driven.
And he who rode proud
"Mid the knelling of cannon,
Lies low on the field
With his war-steed and pennon.
Behold! he hath been
Where the striving was hot;
And pierced with the lances,
And torn with the shot,
His war-horse has sunk—
Never more will he hear
The trumpet, or rush
On the sabre and spear;
And to him who bestrode him,
What minstrel will yield
More meek than he merits
Who flies from the field?

PARTING OF FRIENDS.

How oft the tenderest ties are broken—
How oft the parting tear must flow;
The words of friendship scarce are spoken,
Ere those are gone we love below;
Like suns they rose, and all was bright:
Like sons they set, and all is night.

POPULAR EXCITEMENTS.

NO. IX.

The long and bloody struggle of our fathers, against the oppressions of Britain were scarcely ended, ere an attempt was made to annihilate all the advantages resulting from that glorious struggle, by the blasting influence of a popular excitement. When peace was concluded with the enemy, and the entire American army, with their arms still in their hands, were without employment, the sedition of the well known "Newburgh Letters" was sown in camp, for the purpose of turning loose the passions of the army upon its kindred and friends. The able and powerful penman of these seditious papers insisted so strenuously upon his upright intentions, that virtue and honesty were, for the moment, deceived, and betrayed into the belief that "publick good" was intended. To rouse the passions of those to whom he dared not declare his object, and thus blindly drive them to assist in his wickedness, he addressed to the officers of the army language so insidious as scarcely to be withstood. "Like you," says this secret mover of sedition of himself, assuming to speak in the third person, "he loved private life, and left it with regret. He has felt the cold hand of poverty without a murmur, and saw the insolence of wealth without a sigh. But, too much under the direction of his wishes, and sometimes weak enough so mistake desire for opinion, he has until lately—very lately, believed in the justice of his country. But faith has its limits as well as temper, and there are points beyond which neither can be stretched without sinking into cowardice or plunging into credulity. This, my friends, I conceive to be your situation. Hurried to the very verge of both, another step would ruin you forever. To be tame and unprovoked when injuries press hard upon you, is more than weakness; but to look up for kinder usage, without one effort of your own, would fix your character, and show the world how richly you deserve the chains you broke. Can you consent to wade through the vile mire of dependency, and owe the miserable remnant of that life to charity, which has hitherto been spent in honour? If you can—go—and carry with you the jest of Tories and the scorn of Whigs: the ridicule and, what is worse, the pity of the world."

In such impassioned language, and at a moment of great national danger, did this guardian of the public good appeal to the heated zeal of a camp: and by it, strove to let loose upon the people the unrestrained fury of the army, to secure to the respective parties their mutual rights and personal safety. At this remote day we are at no loss to discern in this appeal, the language of the demagogue, striving for phrenzy and confusion; yet it required all the wisdom and authority of Washington to avert the storm this appeal was calculated to produce. The motive was concealed from general observation, by the language employed, and the manner of treating the subject. The effect of the appeal, in the language of history, was in its instant operation. "Like the train to which a torch is applied, the passions quickly caught its flame, and nothing seemed to be required but the assemblage invited on the succeeding day to communicate the conflagration to the combustible mass, and to produce an explosion alike tremendous and ruinous."

These awful consequences were prevented by an early exposure of the wickedness which had prompted the "publick guardian" to the step he had taken. The commander-in-chief, while noticing the subject to the officers, observes: "The writer of the address should have had more charity than to mark for suspicion the man who should recommend moderation. But he had an other plan in view, in which candour and liberality of sentiment, regard to justice, and love of country have no part. And he was right to insinuate the darkest suspicion to effect the blackened design."

In the commotion which now pervades society, without circumspection there is manifestly danger. To render it more permanent, and to expand its influence, the language of refinement and the grosser epithets of contumely are alternately employed. The habitual admirer of the arts has been plied with inflammatory exhibitions of the pencil; and even the decrepid numbers of the tenth muse, have been placed in requisition, and often chaunted to the people. Convocations of our citizens, when assembled upon the subject of personal rights, have been converted into political synods, and these have received support by calls of county and state conventions, still farther to advance the movers' political preferment. No favourite subject of the people is suffered to exist unconnected with this commotion. Even the veneration of our citizens for the great National Anniversary, has been turned to advantage by the exclusive guardians of the publick weal, by one of whom a collection of many thousand people was recently harrangued upon the importance of pushing onward the excitement.

REASON.

NO. X.

When that army which won us the liberties we now enjoy, had closed its arduous labours, and was about to be dissolved, and its members to be again blended with the mass of the population, the exclusive guardians of publick order discovered a plot among the officers which, like the present one, threatened to annihilate the supposed destiny of our nation. At the period just mentioned, the thought of an eternal separation, which was suggested to the officers by the order for disbanding the army, caused reflections so painful as to produce an effort for the continuance of those friendships which had been formed amid nights of watchfulness and days of conflict and blood. For this purpose "an arrangement was entered into by which the officers were to constitute themselves into one society of friends, to endure as long as they should endure; and to mark their veneration for that celebrated Roman, between whose situation and their own, they found some similitude, they were to be denominated the society of the Cincinnati." The badge of the order was a gold medal, to be suspended from the neck of the wearer by a blue ribbon, edged with white, emblematic of the union of America with France. The objects of the society were, to perpetuate existing friendships and a spirit of brotherly kindness among the officers, and to create a fund from which to draw, as occasion might require, for the relief of distressed officers and their families. In this society, at the head of which stood general Washington, himself, the publick guardians discovered the seeds of anarchy and treason. The badges and the ceremonies of the society were denounced; the former as dangerously marking invidious distinctions, and the latter as too trifling and childish to engage the attention of those who practised them; and therefore they could be no other than a show, to amuse the people, and divert attention from the treason to our liberties which they were designed to secrete. The fund too, scanty as it was, and drawn from a source which alone should have rendered it sacred, gave fresh cause of complaint. It might be used for the subversion of our liberties, by feeding the assassin or pampering the extravagances of the traitor. In the full view of all these dangers and apprehensions, Judge Burke, of South Carolina, wrote his memorable pamphlet, against this society. Our civil and political institutions were on the verge of dissolution, in the view of this publick guardian, and his motto, "Blow ye the trumpet of Zion," was indicative of the crisis to which it was applied. In this pamphlet the author portrayed in that fervid and infectious language which is the genuine offspring of passion or design, the supposed dangers to result from the society of the Cincinnati. Nor was that language without its effect. The exclusive champions of social order every where presented themselves, claiming support for publick office, as a reward for their vigilance, and avowing their thorough conviction that the government, to be safe, must be lodged in their hands. Throughout the struggle with Britain they had not acted, but this society had roused their love of country; as its principles did not suit their pacific taste. "Now that the tempest of strife was over, it was the time for their 'still, small, voice' to command. The highest streamer of the last departing ship which bore away our baffled foe was lost in the convexity of the ocean, and the talons of the Eagle were fixed in the heart of the prostrate Lion. The storm had ceased, the sun was shining, and the lovers of peace crept from their hiding places to bask in its beams. But their eyes were shocked by the emblems which met their view. The golden Eagle of the Cincinnati, that noble badge which decorated the breasts of the wearers, that guerdon to men of dauntless spirit and lofty daring, that evidence of the scaling of ramparts, the storming of redoubts, and the leading on of

'The high in hope, misnamed forlorn,
Who hold the fear of death in scorn,'

that badge was offensive—it savoured of privilege, and our freedom would be short lived if we tolerated a privileged class in our republic!" "Such was the feeling upon this point," says the historian, "that, throughout every state, the alarm was spread, and a high degree of jealousy pervaded the mass of the people." Resolutions were passed that no member of the order should be held eligible to publick office, while he refused to renounce his attachment to the society, and manifestos were scattered through the land, inviting all true patriots and sincere christians to frown upon its members and distrust their motives. The latitude thus given to the passions produced for a time the desired effect. As in the present commotion, the ties of social order were sundered, the bonds of friendship were broken; distrust and suspicion pervaded every neighbourhood, and penetrated almost every dwelling. Former scenes of domestic happiness were converted into fields for the exercise of all the grossest passions; insult and contumely, when offered by the rising generation to the war-worn veteran, if decorated with the badge of the Cincinnati, were applauded as the sure presages to patriotick devotion; and no merit, when tried by the tainted standard of these publick guardians, could equal that of bringing to open disgrace the Father of our country, and his venerable companions.

REASON.

NO. XI.

Scarcely had the clamour against the society of the Cincinnati passed its zenith, when the promoters of discord found, in the Massachusetts' insurrection, new cause to disturb the nation, for "publick good." The lax and equivocal notions of the national guardians, concerning publick and private faith, laid the foundation of an organized system for the destruction of all existing laws; which the movers eventually declared indispensable to the preservation of personal rights and social order. By concert and energy of action, these disturbers continued to excite the unsuspecting, until the number of adherents became formidable; and the disorderly spirit, which at first had only shown itself in individuals, was now cherished by unlicensed conventions, which were repeatedly assembled. These, after voting their own constitutionality, and assuming the name of the people, arrayed themselves against the constituted authorities, and openly declared that no laws or other civil regulations, except such as owed their origin to themselves, and were enforced by their authority, should longer be observed or held valid. It was not until such formidable ground had been assumed, that the true character of this excitement was discovered. The guardians of publick order had constantly avowed their intentions to be purely patriotick, and aimed only at the destruction of a secret combination, that was exerting its unseen influence to deprive the population of property, liberty, and eventually, of even life itself. The national jealousy of freemen, aided by the inflammatory appeals which were made to their passions, left no time for reflection, and consequently the the absurd pretensions of the aspirants were received as the effusions of honesty and truth. Gathering strength from these delusive pretensions, assemblages of the people were called to deliberate upon publick affairs, and from these the aspirants drew votes of thanks for past services, and delegated authority, constituting them committees of future vigilance, for the better preservation of the country. In this delusive form, the commotion continued to gather strength as it rolled onwards, until the total of its supporters amounted to fifteen thousand men. Of these a large portion was actually embodied, and under arms, traversing the country in search of that secret phantom which they were told, was imperceptibly preying upon the very principle of their animated existence. Appeals to reason at this period, proved wholly unavailing, for the torrent of prejudice and passion which inundated the mental faculties, had effectually obscured that which alone could guide, in safety, through a labyrinth so perplexing.

With the force that has been mentioned as commanding, the aspirants found themselves unable to proceed farther without exposing their actual designs. In the face of repeated declarations that they had no political designs, meetings were held and conventions created, for the sole purpose of dictating the selection of candidates, and the nature of their support. This first caused the followers to pause in their course, and, eventually, dissolved the charm. The commotion had reached that height when it could no longer sustain an equivocal character. The professions of aspirants were disregarded when their truth became questioned by practice; and the congregated mass of the people who had been drawn aside from their duty, and the dictates of their deliberate judgements, abandoned the cause they had espoused, and openly proclaimed their want of faith in the pretended honesty of the men who had led them astray. A spirited writer of the day, when commenting upon this commotion, observes: "The dangers complained of were but ideal, and seldom accredited by those who most used them. Such were, for the most part, designing actors in the drama, who were busy in magnifying and fomenting causeless jealousies and disturbances. The evil intentions of these men were discovered barely in time to prevent the most serious result. Under pretence of aiding the people to preserve their rights, they were exerting an influence destructive of all rights. Men whose standing in society was equivocal, and even highly base, were, in many towns exalted to responsible stations, in which nothing but the warmth of this fever could ever have placed them; and such, in many instances, from being the basest in community, came for a season, to be consulted as sages—and the actions of better men were adjudged as they gave opinions. Yet this strange state of things was of short duration, for it was produced by delusion, acting upon the passions of the honest people, who, having no base design themselves, did not, until the lapse of a little time, discover it in others. But when this was done, it seemed to sink the authors of the wrong so low, as to leave them no chance for a second successful attempt of a like nature."

TOPOGRAPHY.

RUSSIAN ACQUISITIONS BY THE LATE WAR.

A French paper gives the following description of the different posts in Asiatic Turkey, ceded to Nicholas by the treaty of Adrianople.

Situated upon the coast of Circassia; between the 44th and 46th degree of latitude, Anapa is improperly considered as an Asiatic city. A short distance separates it from the Gulf of Taman, and, consequently, from the sea of Azof, and from the peninsula of Crimea. The Turks founded this establishment in 1784, when the Russians had occupied Tamman, which, before that period was the principal market of the Circassians.

Anapa was the residence of a pacha. Its situation, and its possession was so much the more important to the Turks, as it served them as a means of communication not only with the Mussulman inhabitants of Caucasus, but, probably, with the Sunnite Tartars of Bukharia, who acknowledged the sultan as their caliph, or religious chief. From the distance of this communication it must be taken for granted that between Derbend and Fritzlär there existed one or more points of embarkation, and also that the Black Sea was passed over in order to gain the Gulf of Mengischlack. One thing at least is certain, that the Khan of Bukharia sent every three years three millions in gold to the Sultan, and received an embassy charged to thank him for that service. Now it is difficult to point out any other route that this embassy could have taken, than the interior of Caucasus, which extends in its whole length from Anapa to the Black Sea. The passage by Persia and Kourdistan would present much danger. The population does not yet amount to beyond 3000, of whom one-third are Turks, and the rest Circassians, Armenians, and Greeks. The last were rigidly watched, and treated as captives.

The fortress of Anapa mounts eighty brass cannons. It was taken in 1807 by the Russians, and it is a fact worthy of observation, that they were headed by two Frenchmen. The Duke of Richelieu commanded the land force, and the Marquis of Traversay the fleet. After the peace of 1812, Anapa was restored to the Porte—a measure so contrary to the interests of Russia, that it could only be excused on the part of general Koutousoff, the negotiator for peace, by the urgent necessity of disposing of the army of Moldavia against the French, who were about to attack Moscow. The pacha of Anapa excited a continual state of hostilities between the people of Caucasus and the Russians. He furnished the former with arms and with ammunition, and purchased the men, the women, and children, who were captured in their excursions beyond the Kouban. The Turks had also established in this place an open market with the Circassians, for the supply of their harems in Constantinople. The young women brought from the interior of the country were there exchanged for the merchandize of Europe. "Anapa," says M. Gambia, "might then become an advantageous station for the French, who should have establishments on the coast of Abazes, or Mingrelia, especially if this port should pass under the dominion of Russia, who will, no doubt, endeavor to civilize by commerce the Circassians, and successively the other inhabitants of Caucasus."

Pursuing the oriental coast of the Black Sea to the 42d degree of latitude, Poti discovers itself. This city is situated at the mouth, and upon the left bank, of one of the most celebrated rivers of antiquity—the Phasis, better known now in that part of the world under the name of Reon. The possession of this city by the Turks deprived the Russians of the navigation of the river, which was the more felt by them, as it closes the provinces belonging to Russia between the Black Sea and Georgia, where Teflis is the centre of their government. It was proposed to give a new direction to the Phasis by opening a canal, which should lead directly to the sea from the fort of Rienskaia. This fort was constructed by the Russians, on the right bank, at a league below the mouth, to counterbalance the importance of Poti; but this work presented great difficulties, and the acquisition of Poti rendered it unnecessary. The rich productions of Mingrelia and of Imeritia will descend now without obstacle to the sea.

Since Russia, in consequence of her last conquests from Persia, has extended her frontier to the Upper Araxes, the northern part of Armenia is in some measure incorporated in the provinces of Georgia and Imeritia. The direct communication is about to be re-established by the cession of Akhalzikh. This place is strong, and from its position on the Kour, which is the ancient Cyrus, it commands the course of that great river to its entrance into Georgia. A part of the territory is to be ceded to Russia, at the same time as the town of Akhalzikh, but this portion is not yet determined on.

To the cession of these three important places, some German journals add that of Akhalkaki, a town belonging to the Pachalick of Akhalzikh, and situated 20 leagues to the east of that place on the western frontiers of Georgia. It is possible that it may be included in the portion of territory just mentioned; but as to this, nothing certain is known.

Akhalkalaki (or Akiska, as the Turks call it) was the capital of Ottoman Georgia. It is situated on a river which bears the name and which runs into the Cyrus. The town is surrounded by ditches and a double row of crenelated walls, flanked by square and round towers. The citadel commands

it. The population may be calculated at about 40,000. In this number are included 500 Catholic families, and as many scattered about in the rich villages of the neighbourhood. In the town there are two Catholic churches attended by six priests, who have obtained permission from the Holy See to celebrate worship in Armenian and English.

CHARACTER.

THE LATE JUDGE WASHINGTON.

The following tribute to the memory of the late BRUSH WASHINGTON is from the pen of judge STORY.

The death of Mr. Justice WASHINGTON is an event which cannot but cast a gloom upon all the real friends of our country. He was born on the 5th of June, 1762, and was of course now in the 68th year of his age. It is well known that he was the nephew, and we have to say the favorite nephew of President Washington. The latter bequeathed to him by his will his celebrated estate on the Potomack, Mount Vernon, which was the residence of this great Patriot during the most brilliant periods of his life, the delightful retreat of his old age, the scene of his dying hours, and the spot, where by his own order his ashes now repose in the same tomb with his ancestors. To him also President Washington gave all his valuable public and private papers, as a proof of his entire confidence and attachment, and made him the active executor of his will. Such marks of respect from such a man,—the wonder of his own age, and the model for all future ages,—would alone stamp a character of high merit, and solid distinction, upon any person. They would constitute a passport to public favor, and confer an enviable rank far beyond the records of the herald's office, or the fugitive honors of a title.

It is high praise to say, that Mr. Justice Washington well deserved such confidence and distinction. Nay more. His merits went far beyond them. He was as worthy an heir as ever claimed kindred with a worthy ancestor. He was bred to the law in his native State of Virginia, and arrived at such early eminence in his profession, that as long ago as 1798 he was selected by President Adams as a Justice of the Supreme Court, upon the decease of the late Judge Wilson, of Penn. For thirty-one years he has held that important station with a constantly increasing reputation and usefulness. Few men, indeed, have possessed higher qualifications for the office, either natural or acquired. Few men have left deeper traces in their judicial career of every thing, which a conscientious Judge ought to propose for his ambition or his virtue, or his glory. His mind was solid, rather than brilliant; sagacious and searching, rather than quick for eager; slow, but not torpid; steady, but not unyielding; comprehensive, and at the same time cautious; patient in inquiry, forcible in conception, clear in reasoning. He was by original temperament, mild, conciliating, and candid; and yet was remarkable for an uncompromising firmness. Of him it may be truly said, that the fear of man never fell upon him; it never entered into his thoughts much less was it seen in his actions. In him the love of justice was the ruling passion, it was the master spring of all his conduct. He made it a matter of conscience to discharge every duty with scrupulous fidelity; and scrupulous zeal. It mattered not, whether the duty were small or great, witnessed by the world, or performed in private, every where the same diligence, watchfulness, and pervading sense of justice was seen. There was about him a tenderness of giving offence, and yet a fearlessness of consequences in his official character, which I scarcely know how to portray. It was a rare combination, which added much to the dignity of the bench, and made justice itself, even when most severe, soften into the moderation of mercy. It gained confidence, when it seemed least to seek it. It repressed arrogance by overawing or confounding it.

To say, that as a Judge he was wise, impartial, and honest, is but to attribute to him those qualifications, without which the honors of the bench are but the means of public disgrace, or contempt. His honesty was a deep vital principle, but meanured out by worldly rules. His impartiality was a virtue of his nature, disciplined and instructed by constant reflection upon the infirmity, and accountability of man. His wisdom was the wisdom of the Law, chastened and refined and invigorated by study, guided by experience, dwelling little on theory, but constantly enlarging itself by a close survey of principles.

He was a learned Judge. I do not mean by this, that every day learning, which may be gathered up by a hasty reading of books and cases. But that, which is the result of long continued, laborious services, and comprehensive studies. He read to learn, and not to quote; to digest and master, and not merely to display. He was not easily satisfied. If he was not as profound as some, he was more exact than most men. But the value of his learning was, that it was the key, stone of all his judgments. He indulged not the rash desire to fashion the law to his own views; but to follow out its precepts with a sincere good faith and simplicity. Hence he possessed the happy faculty of yielding just the proper weight to authority, neither on the one hand surrendering himself blindfolded to the dictates of other Judges, nor on the other hand overruling settled doctrines upon his own private notion of policy or justice.

In short, as a Magistrate, he was exemplary, and able, one whom all may reverence, and but few may hope to equal.

But after all, it is as a man, that those who knew him best, will most love to contemplate him. There was daily beauty in his life, which won every heart. He was benevolent, charitable, affectionate and liberal in the best sense of the terms. He was a Christian, full of religious sensibility, and religious humility. Attached to the Episcopal Church by education and choice, he was one of its most sincere, but unostentatious friends. He was as free from bigotry as any man; and at the same time, that he claimed the right to think for himself, he admitted, without reserve, the same right in others. He was, therefore; indulgent even to what he deemed errors in doctrine, and abhorred all persecution for conscience sake. But what made religion most attractive in him, and gave it occasionally even a sublime expression, was its tranquil, cheerful, unobtrusive, meek, and gentle character. There was a mingling of christian graces in him, which shewed that the habit of his thoughts was fashioned for another and better world. Of his particular opinions on doctrinal points, it is not my intention to speak. Such as they were, though good men may differ, as to their correctness, all must agree, that they breathed the spirit of an inquisitive christian.

He was a real lover of the constitution of the United States; one of those who assisted in its adoption, and steadily and uniformly supported it through every change of its fortunes. He was a good old fashioned federalist, of the school of the days of Washington. He never lost his confidence in the political principles, which he first embraced. He was always distinguished for moderation in the days of their prosperity, and for fidelity to them in the days of their adversity.

I have not said too much, then, in saying, that such a man is a public loss. We are not, indeed, called to mourn over him, as one, who is cut off prematurely in the vigor of manhood. He was ripe in honors, and in virtues. But the departure of such a man severs so many ties, interrupts so many delights, withdraws so many confidences, and leaves such an aching void in the hearts of friends, and such a sense of desolation among associates, that while we bow to the decree of Providence, our griefs cannot but pour themselves out in sincere lamentations.

THE GATHERER.

From the "Editor's Table," in Willis' Magazine, for December.

A DAY IN DECEMBER,

A spring day has burst upon us in December. Here we sit—a south window open on one side and our quiet Lehigh glowing on the other, and we scarce now whether the constant warmth of the one, or the fresh sunny breathings from the other, are the most welcome. Our curtains swing lazily to the mild wind as it enters, and the light green leaves of our sheltered flowers stir and erect themselves with an out-of-door vigor, and the shuffled steps and continued voices of the children in the street, have the loitering and summer-like sound of June. We do not know whether it is not a cockney feeling, but with all our love for the country, fixed as it is by the recollection of a life mostly spent in the "green fields" we sometimes "babble of," there is something in a summer morning in the city, which the wet, warm woods, and the solitary, though lonely haunts of the country, do not, after all the poetry that has been "spilt upon them," (as Neal would say) at all equal. Whether it is that we find so much sympathy in the many faces that we meet, made happy by the same sweet influences, or whatever else may be the reason, certainly, we never take our morning walk on such a day as the delicious one now about us, without a leaping in our heart, which, from all we can gather by dream or revelation, has a touch in it of Paradise. We returned just now from an hour's ramble after breakfast. The air rushed past our temples with the grateful softness of spring, and our feet bent up from the moist sidewalk with a sensation of grace, and every face that passed us had the open, inhaling expression, which is given by the simple joy of existence. The sky has the deep clearness of noon. The clouds were winnowed in light parallel curves, looking like white shells inlaid on the arched Heavens; the smooth, glassy bay, was like a transparent abyss opening to the earth's centre, and edging away underneath with a slope of hills and spires and leafless woods, copied minutely and perfectly from the upper landscape, and the naked elm seemed almost clothed as the teeming eye looked on them, and the brown hills took a tint of green—so freshly did the summer fancies crowd into the brain with the summer softness of the sunshine and air. The mood is rare in which the sight of human faces does not give us pleasure. It is a curious occupation to look on them as they pass, and study their look and meaning, and wonder at the Providence of God, which can provide in this crowded world, an object and an interest for all. With what a singular harmony the great machine of society goes on! So many thousand minds, and each with its peculiar cast and its positive difference from its fellow, and yet no dangerous interference, and no discord audible above the hum of its daily revolution. We could not help feeling a religious thrill this morning, as we passed face after face, with this thought in our mind, and saw each one earnest and cheerful, each one pressing on with its own object, without waiting or caring for the equally engrossing object of the other. The man of business went on with an absorbed look, caring only to thread his way rapidly along the street. The student strided by with the step of exercise, his lips parted to admit the pleasant air to his refreshed lungs, and his eye wandering with bewildered pleasure from object to object. The schoolboy looked wistfully up and down the street, and lingered till the last stroke of the bell summoned him tardily in. The womanish school-girl, with her veil coquetishly drawn, still flirted with her boyish admirer, though it was "after nine," and the child with its soiled satchel and shining face, loitered seriously along the sidewalk, making acquaintance with every dog, and picking up every stone on its unwilling way. The spell of the atmosphere was universal, and yet all kept on their several courses, and the busy harmony of employment went steadily and unbroken on. How rarely we turn upon ourselves and remember how wonderfully we are made and governed!

MATERNAL AFFECTION.

A MOTHER AND HER CHILDREN IN THE PLAGUE

In the village of Careggi, whether it were that precautions had not been taken, or that the disease was of a peculiarly malignant nature, one after another—first the young and then the old, of a whole family dropped off. A woman, who lived on the opposite side of the way, the wife of a labourer, and mother of two little boys, felt herself attacked by fever in the night; in the morning it greatly increased, and in the evening the fatal typhus appeared. This was during the absence of her husband, who went to work at a distance, and only returned on Saturday night, bringing home the scanty means of subsistence for his family for the week. Terrified by the example of the neighbouring family, moved by the fondest love for her children, and determined not to communicate the disease to them, she formed the heroic resolution of leaving her home and going elsewhere to die. Having locked them into a room and sacrificed to their safety even the last and sole comfort of a parting embrace, she ran down the stairs, carrying with her the sheets and coverlet, that she might leave no means of contagion. She then shut the door with a sigh, and went away. But the biggest, hearing the door shut went to the window, and seeing her running in that manner, cried out, "Good bye, mother," in a voice so tender that she involuntarily stopped—"Good bye, mother," repeated the youngest child, stretching its little head out of the window; and thus was the poor afflicted mother compelled for a time to endure the dreadful conflict between the yearnings which called her back, and the pity and solicitude which urged her on; at length the latter conquered—and amid a flood of tears, and the farewells of her children, who knew not the fatal cause and import of these tears—she reached the house of those who were to bury her: she recommended her husband and children to them, and in two days she was no more. "But," added Barbara, "nothing can equal the heart of a mother. You remember that sublime speech of a poor woman on hearing her parish priest relate the history of Abraham: "Oh God certainly would not have required such a sacrifice of a mother."—La Monaca di Monza.

MISERIES ATTENDANT ON A DISREGARD OF TRUTH.

There would be no end to the appalling and heart rending scenes which the general violation of truth would bring on the stage of common life. Suffice it to say, that when Truth left the earth she would not leave it alone. Justice and Honesty, her first born, would forsake it too. The kindly feelings of our nature would wither and droop. The broad face of this beautiful earth would be converted into one vast arena, where men, with passions more inflamed than those of the hunted lion, would prowl and prey upon each other without mercy, and without end. The populous city would become a desert place. Man would flee from the likeness of his own form. His abode would be as vacant as the hermit's cell, and as still as the dwellings of the dead. The quick step would no more be heard on the pavement; and the busy hum would be hushed; the voice of gladness be no longer heard; and deserted, desponding man, a stranger in his native place, and an exile in his own land, would wend his lonely way among forsaken tenements and dilapidated walls, and weep in vain over the ruins of Virtue and Truth. [Young's Discourse.]

PROPRIETY.

Propriety is to a woman what the great Roman critic says action is to an orator; it is the first, the second, and the third requisite. A woman may be knowing, active and amusing; but without propriety she cannot be amiable. Propriety is the centre in which all the lines of duty and agreeableness meet. It is to character, what proportion is to figure, and grace to attitude. It does not depend on any one perfection, but it is the result of general excellence.

It shows itself by a regular, orderly, undeviating course; and never starts from its sober orbit into any splendid eccentricities: for it would be ashamed of such praise as it might extort by any deviations from its proper path. It renounces all commendation but what is characteristic; and I would make it the criterion of true taste, right principle, and genuine feeling in a woman whether she would be less touched with all the flattery of exaggerated and romantic panegyric, than with that beautiful picture of correct and elegant propriety which Milton draws of our first Mother, whom he delineates,

"Those thousand decencies, which daily flow,
From all her words and actions."

No religion ever appeared in the world whose natural tendency was so much directed to promote the peace and happiness of mankind as Christianity.

STORY OF A BULL AND A PARSON.

OR, THE FIRST AND LAST SERMON OF ICHABOD WING.

Whether the events of the following story happened in Massachusetts or Connecticut, is nothing at all to the purpose; it is enough that they are positive facts—that is—the substance of them, for we got the story at second hand, we cannot vouch for it in toto; but the main facts are so authentic, that in the words of Sancho Panza, that mirror of story-telling and squire-errantry, a body may not only believe, but swear to the truth of them.

Ichabod Wing was the son of a farmer in one of the interior towns of New-England. He was a simple nobby, but he knew a hawk from a hand-saw, and had wit enough, sometimes, to go within doors when it was raining. With these few accomplishments he might have got along well enough in the world, and gone out of it at last without knowing whether it stood still or turned round: but fate and the Young Men's Education Society had ordained otherwise.

Ichabod had somehow or other, and most unaccountably to himself, got the reputation of not being remarkably knowing and acute in the affairs of this world. He always got over-reached in going to market, made terrible losing bargains in swapping even, and never made a calculation without missing a figure. He would throw the helve after the hatchet, rob Peter to pay Paul, get himself April fooled, run into the water for fear of rain, stand in his own sunshine, go on a Tom-fool's errand, swallow a fish story, and believe what the newspapers said. In short, there was no making any thing of him, so the Young Men's Education Society determined to make him a parson.

Every body in the country knows the Young Men's Education Society. They take it upon them to bring up young men to the ministry, and shew a wonderful tact in selecting the objects of their care. Like Garrick's Scotchman who was told that his genius did not lie in comedy, and thence concluded that it must lie in tragedy, these sagacious people when they find a youth not remarkably blessed with worldly wisdom, very naturally infer that he must be gifted with some more divine faculty, and though in the eyes of the world he may be an incorrigible numskull, he is to them a person peculiarly fitted to become a burning and a shining light—thus they evince a determination to verify the text of scripture "not many wise, &c. are called."

Now Ichabod was just the fellow for this: he was a timorous, sheepish sort of an animal who looked as if he did not dare say his soul was his own. The directors of the Young Men's Education Society saw at the first glance that he was exactly cut out for their purpose; so they persuaded Ichabod to betake himself to theological studies; there was no difficulty in doing this, for Ichabod was never known to be obstinate, simple soul! like Cornelius Scriblerus, he always agreed with the last opinion he heard.

To make a long story short, he got through his studies and was licensed to preach—it was a terrible thing in his apprehension, to preach the first sermon, as he was not remarkable for the strength of his nerves. He bethought himself of the project of going into the field, holding forth to the cabbages, and fancying each head to be an auditor. Some say he actually did it, but this is rather dubious—however it is certain the thing was done, if not by Ichabod Wing, at least by others in his line, and to judge by the logic which many of these gentlemen hold to their congregations, one would imagine they thought themselves preaching to cabbage-heads still.

But let that pass. Ichabod, after pondering a long while upon the matter, determined to go to a distant town and make his first essay in the pulpit. He accordingly managed to get himself despatched for this purpose to a congregation at distance where the minister was absent on a journey for the benefit of his health, a sort of remedy for slight diseases very highly prized by the clergy. Ichabod quartered himself upon the possessor of the fattest looking farm he could espy, by which it appears that he was not such a fool as to despise good living, and possessed one instinct for which men of his cloth are famous. But let that pass also. Sunday came; Ichabod got ready his sermon with great trepidation, and conned it over again and again to make himself sure of it.

The congregation met, and the meeting house was filled, but the minister put it off terribly. The bell kept tolling and tolling till the people thought it never would be done. They yawned and stared about and kept peeping out at the windows,—just as if they expected he would come sooner for that. At last Deacon Snacks got up and spoke to 'Squire Barleycorn—

"'Squire, where is the minister?"

"Really, Deacon, I don't know. He came out of my house just after me, but he walked so slow that I got out of sight of him."

"It's very strange he don't come."

"Very strange."

Here Miss Deborah Peepabout, an elderly virgin, who held the opinion of Paul Pry that "the spirit of inquiry is the grand characteristic of the age in which we live," and who also felt a particular sympathy in the fate of unmarried clergymen, thrust her long nose between the Deacon and the 'Squire and asked—

"Law me! Deacon,—'Squire,—why don't the minister come?"

Then Miss Martha Buskbody, seeing the Deacon, the 'Squire and Miss Peepabout engaged in a colloquy, wriggled herself into their company and asked the same question.

Then another and another and another followed the example, and there was quickly a knot of people gathered round the Deacon and the 'Squire, all asking questions which nobody could answer. The whole congregation was in a buzz-buzzing. Every one was asking where the minister was, although every one knew that all the rest were just as ignorant as himself.

Bill Muggs, the sexton, kept tugging away at the bell-rope till he had tolled the people out of patience.—But we must leave the bell tolling, and the sexton fretting, and the Deacon and the 'Squire and the old maids, and all the rest of the congregation on the tenter-hooks of suspense, and go back to see what has become of our friend Ichabod.

Ichabod had slackened his pace after leaving the house and had fallen into a sort of a reverie. Finding himself rather late before he got near the church, he resolved to make a short cut across a field where the road made an angle; so jumping over a stone wall he steered directly for the church, but had not proceeded many paces when he was startled by a most savage and unmusical boo-booing sound in a tone of the deepest bass he ever heard. Lifting up his eyes he beheld a furious bull making at him with all speed and bellowing like mad. It is needless to say that he took to his heels; the bull made after him, and Ichabod put on with all the fleetness he could exert. Four legs are better than two, and it was soon evident that the quadruped would win the race. Ichabod found he could not reach the wall before the bull would be up with him. "Now," thought he, "it is all over with me!" His shoes flew off, but the bull kept on. He dropped his hat, but the stratagem did not take; the bull was not to be made a fool of. He threw his sermon behind him, but with no better success; the bull was not to be reasoned with; he gave the manuscript a whisk with his tail and scattered it to the four winds!

"I'm gone! I'm gone!" said Ichabod, for the bull was close behind him;—at this instant he spied an apple-tree close at hand;—and summoning all his remaining strength he made a desperate leap and was fortunate enough to spring into the tree at the moment the bull was at his heels.

Here was an unlooked-for deliverance, but unluckily the bull was not so easily got rid of. Though disappointed of his prey he kept about the tree with such a menacing disposition that Ichabod dared not descend. It seemed as if the malicious animal knew that he kept a congregation waiting, he stuck to the spot with such pertinacity. For two mortal hours did the unlucky Ichabod sit perched upon the tree in sight of the church. Every minute seemed an age to him. He heard the bell toll, toll, toll, and each stroke seemed the funeral knell to his hopes.

He pictured to his fancy a crowded congregation waiting in anxious suspense and lost in wonder and amazement at his non-appearance. "Alas!" said he to himself—

"I hear a voice you cannot hear
Which bids me thus delay.
I see the horns you cannot see
Which force me here to stay."

He saw the congregation come out of the church and scatter hither and thither like sheep without a shepherd, yet he durst not leave the apple tree, because there was—not a lion—but a bull in the way!

The congregation were at last fairly tired out. Two hours had they waited, and no parson came. The sexton left off tolling the bell, and indeed it was quite time, for he had nearly worn the rope off. The people all came out of the church, having after two hours debating upon the matter, come to the conclusion that there would be no sermon, and that there was good ground for alarm as to the fate of the minister. They sent off parties, east, west, north and south, to explore the country, and presently Ichabod discovered a crowd advancing along the road headed by the Deacon and the Sexton. Ichabod mustered all the strength of his lungs and bawled out to them like seven watchmen upon a tower. The whole party came to a halt and gazed around with astonishment and fear: at length they spied something snugly roosted in the apple-tree: they took it at first for a huge black turkey-cock, but on a nearer approach they found it to be no other than the Reverend Parson!

Now the bull just at that moment happened to be pawing and snuffing with his nose close to the ground on the other side of the trees, so that he was hidden from the party by a thorn bush at its foot. The people seeing Ichabod perched on high in that same manner, were struck dumb with amazement for a few moments. Was the poor man bewitched! or had he run mad! or what possessed him to spend the afternoon dangling like a scarecrow on the bough of an apple tree instead of holding forth a godly discourse in the pulpit. For some moments no one dared advance a step further or speak a single word. At last Bill Muggs the sexton plucked up courage and advanced to the stone wall. He was an old sailor, who within a few years had taken his land-tacks aboard and settled himself up in the bush; he took up the trade of a sexton because it consisted in pulling a rope. On this occasion he undertook to be spokesman of the party, for the Deacon was absolutely frightened. Bill put his head over the wall, clapped his hand up to the corner of his mouth and sung out—

"Parson, ahoy!"

Ichabod lifted up his voice, like an owl in the desert, and exclaimed "Come along! come along! save me! save me!"

"Blast your eye-balls," said Bill, clawing a huge quid of tobacco out of his mouth and throwing it slap upon the ground, "why don't you save yourself?"

"I can't I can't," said Ichabod. "Drive him away. Drive him away."

By this time some of the party, and the Deacon among the rest, had got over the wall, and were advancing toward the tree, staring and wondering to hear the parson talk in such an unaccountable manner.

"Come down, come down," said the Deacon. "What have you been doing all the afternoon in Colonel Shute's orchard?"

"Ay, ay," said Bill, "what are you about there aloft without your hat and shoes! looking for all the world like a starved monkey sitting on a lee backstay!"

At this moment the party had got nearly up to the tree. "Look out! Look out!" cried Ichabod, "He's coming!" They had no time to ask who it was that was coming, for before the words were fairly out of his mouth they heard a furious bellow, and, bounce—in an instant the bull was among them! Heavens! what a scampering! The whole squad took flight quicker than a flock of wild ducks on hearing a shot. The Deacon lost his hat and wig, and Captain Blueberry ran out of his boots, which were a little too large for him. Divers other accidents happened. The greatest catastrophes were those of 'Squire Snakeroot and Lieutenant Darling. The 'Squire being pursy and short-winded, was overtaken by the bull, and received a tremendous butt in the rear which disabled him so that he could not sit down without a double cushion for a fortnight. The bull, after knocking him over, ran off after the others, and the 'Squire made a shift to climb up into the tree and take sides with the parson.

The Lieutenant's was a more frightful case. He was a short, fat, thick set, duck-legged fellow, and happened to be dressed in a pair of stout, old-fashioned leather breeches. The bull having floored the 'Squire, came in the twinkling of a bedpost right upon the Lieutenant, who was waddling off in double quick time. The bull hit him a poke behind, intending to serve him as he did the 'Squire, but one of his horns, catching in the waistband of the Lieutenant's inexpressibles, he was taken off his legs in an instant and whisked off upon the bull's horn. Away went the bull scouring after the fugitives, with the unfortunate Lieutenant dangling by the waistband, and fairly out of his wits with terror. His capers in the air were only brought to an end by the bull's bringing up, butt, against the stone wall, and pitching the Lieutenant completely over into the road.

The rest of the party got over the wall without any help, and escaped the fury of the animal. And now commenced a regular set-to. The party armed themselves with stones and clubs and began a pitched battle with the bull for the deliverance of the parson. Thumps, bangs, thrusts, pokes, and missiles of every description, were showered upon the hide of the furious beast, who shook his redoubtable horns, flourished his tail, and ran butting and bellowing here and there, wherever the attack was hottest, the parson and 'Squire meantime shouting from their citadel in the apple tree, cheering on the assailants, and attacking the bull in the rear, by pelting him with small shot in the shape of winter pippins.

This holy war lasted for three quarters of an hour, and the bull seemed likely to win the day. Ichabod fancied himself already reduced to the necessity of taking up his quarters in the tree for the night; but luckily, at this moment a reinforcement arrived, and the bull began slowly to retreat; the assailants, headed by Bill Muggs, pressed their advantage, carried the stone wall by escalade, formed a solid column, and in a short time the bull was driven from the field without the loss of a single man. And thus the victory being achieved—Ichabod came down from the tree.

But it was all over with him. His sermon was gone, the afternoon was gone, and he soon found that his hopes of "wagging his paw in a pulpit" were gone. The bull was never out of his mind. He never had the courage to attempt another sermon, and at the very thought of marching to church in a surplice, he imagines, to this day, he hears a boo-boo-ing and sees a pair of horns.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE NAPOLEON.

The following curious narrative is taken from the fourth series of M. de Bourrienne's Memoirs, recently published. The author relates the narrative on the authority of general Rapp, who witnessed the occurrence.

About this time a youth conceived the design of assassinating Napoleon, in order to deliver Germany from the yoke of one whom he considered as the scourge of nations. Rapp and Berthier were both near the person of the emperor when the culprit was arrested; a circumstance that enables me to furnish the following exact and authentic statement of this event. "We were at Schoenbrunn," said Rapp, "where the emperor had just reviewed the troops. I had already remarked a young man at the extremity of one of the columns, when, just as the troops were about to file off, I observed him advancing towards the emperor, who was then between Berthier and myself. The prince de Neufchatel, imagining that he was desirous of presenting a petition, made a slight movement forwards, for the purpose of intimating to him that his request should be preferred through me, I being that day the aid-de-camp on service. The young man declared that he wished to speak to Napoleon himself; and Berthier repeated that his petition must be presented through me. The stranger retreated to a short distance, still evincing a strong anxiety to speak to Napoleon. Again he advanced, and approached rather close to the emperor: I, however, compelled him to retire. Accosting him in the German language, I desired him to wait till after the parade, adding, that should he have any claim to urge, he would then be heard. I continued to observe him attentively, his pertinacity having inspired me with suspicions by no means to his advantage. I remarked that he kept his right hand placed inside his great coat near the left breast pocket, from which the corner of a paper was rather studiously displayed, as if to divert attention from his real object. Perceiving an officer of gendarmes, I beckoned to him to advance, and recommended him to seize the person of the young man, but without violence or noise, and to detain him privately at the chateau till the parade should be over. The crowd assembled were so occupied with the movements of the troops, that the scene which I have just described passed wholly unnoticed. Immediately after the review, I was informed that an enormous kitchen knife had been found upon the stranger, whose name, as it afterwards appeared, was Staps. Sending instantly for Duroc, I accompanied him to the room where Staps had been confined. We found him seated on a bed: his air was that of sadness but by no means of terror. In his possession were found the portrait of a female, a pocket book, and a purse containing two pieces of gold. I questioned him as to his name, with which he refused to acquaint me, saying that he would tell it only to Napoleon. I then asked him to what purpose he had destined the knife found upon his person? Still the same answer—"I can tell it only to Napoleon." "Is it possible," replied, I, "that you can have meditated an attempt upon his life?" "Yes." "And why?" "I can tell it only to Napoleon." The singularity of this adventure induced me to inform the emperor of all that had passed. My statement finished, he appeared rather thoughtful: for ideas of assassination were continually floating in his brain. He ordered me to conduct the young man into his cabinet. Conformably to the instructions which I transmitted them, two gendarmes escorted the stranger into the presence of Napoleon. Notwithstanding the atrocity of his intended crime, Staps had something interesting in his countenance—an expression of benignity which it was difficult to resist. The emperor asked him if he could speak French. "Not very well," replied Staps: upon which I was desired to interrogate him in German. I shall now proceed to an accurate detail of the examination which he underwent by order of the emperor, whose anxiety on this occasion was such that he himself dictated the questions, my office being simply that of interpreter. Accordingly, the following dialogue may be considered to have passed between Napoleon himself and Staps. "Whence come you?" "From Nuremberg." "What is your father?" "A Protestant clergyman." "Your age?" "Eighteen." "What use did you intend to make of your knife?" "I intended to kill you with it." "Young man, you are mad: you are one of the Illumines." "I am not mad: I do not even know what an Illumine means." "You must be ill." "I am not ill: I never in my life was better." "Why did you desire to kill me?" "You are the source of my country's misery." "Have I ever injured you?" "Me, in common with my countrymen." "Who can have urged you to this crime? who are your accomplices?" "I have none: the intimate conviction that your death would be a blessing to Europe and my country has alone armed my hand against you." "And yet you now see me for the first time?" "I saw you at Erfurth, on the occasion of your interview with the Emperor of Russia." "Did you at this time intend to assassinate me?" "No: I then imagined you would not make war upon Germany: I was then one of your most ardent admirers." "How long have you been at Vienna?" "Ten days." "Why then have you so long delayed your attempt?" "I came to Schoenbrunn eight days ago, with the intention of killing you; but on my arrival I found that the parade was over: I therefore postponed the execution of my project till to-day." "You are mad, I tell you; or else you are ill." At this stage of the interrogatory the emperor gave orders that Corvisart should be summoned to his presence. Having asked who he was, and being told that he was a physician,—"I have not the least occasion for him," said Staps. Immediately on the entrance of Corvisart, Napoleon ordered him to feel the young man's pulse, which he instantly did; Staps all the time displaying the most inconceivable phlegm, and at length observing to the doctor, with sang froid, "They tell me I am ill; but you see they are mistaken—are they not?" "He is quite well, sire," replied Corvisart, addressing himself to the emperor. "I told you so," said Staps, in a tone of evident triumph and satisfaction. I was thunderstruck with the German's imperturbable phlegm; and the emperor himself seemed wholly confounded at his audacity. After a few moments, Napoleon again accosted Staps. "Your imagination is heated: you will be the ruin of your family. I grant you your life on one condition: instantly ask my pardon for your atrocious intention, which you now must certainly regret." "I want no pardon: my most poignant regret arises from the failure of my design." "It seems then that crime is nothing in your eyes?" "To kill you is not a crime: it is a duty." "What portrait is that found in your possession?" "It is that of a young girl to whom I am devotedly attached." "Your attempt will doubtless plunge her into the deepest affliction?" "She will be afflicted at its ill success: her abhorrence for you equals mine." Would not a pardon inspire you with gratitude?" "Though you should pardon me, I would again attempt your life." Napoleon was stupefied with amazement. The answers and the unalterable resolution of Staps appeared absolutely to overwhelm him. He ordered the prisoner to be led away; and when he was gone, "These are your Illumines," said the emperor—"fine principles, fine lights, that transform the youth of Germany into hardened assassins!" After a fruitless endeavour, at a subsequent examination, to elicit some confession from Staps, the order was given for his execution, which accordingly took place on the 27th October, at seven o'clock in the morning. The attempt for which he suffered had been made on the 23d, and from that period up to the morning of his execution he refused to taste food. "I have still strength enough," said he, "to march to the scaffold." On his arrival at the fatal spot, and the preparations of death being terminated, his last cry was for liberty and Germany: his dying prayer, or rather execration, invoked destruction upon her tyrant.

THE EIGHTEEN-YEARS OLD FEVER.

There is a period in the life of every young man, over which to pass safely requires the most skillful navigation. To double this point is more dangerous to the moral character, than for a navigator to double Cape Horn. The whirlpool of pride, and the quicksands of self-conceit, yawn upon them, and are to a young man what Sylla and Charybdis were to the ancients. This period is from sixteen to twenty-one years of age; and during this time a young man is subject to what is commonly called the "eighteen-years old fever," though owing to the precocity of some, they are attacked as early as sixteen. The effects of this disease are altogether different from those morbid complaints to which the human system is subject; instead of wasting away, it produces a general inflation of the intellect, if I may so express it, which renders the subject more like a bladder filled with wind, than a rational being.

A young man under the influence of this disease is a perfect wiseacre. He is too knowing to learn from the experience of age; he knows best what is for his own interest; his parents and all that have gone before him, are in his opinion fools; he imagines himself to be the first of a very wise generation, and therefore construes every friendly admonition into an attempt to coerce him, or to abridge his privileges. He discovers the down of puberty upon his chin, and believes that the application of a razor to his phiz would put the finishing touch; for if he has a beard and shaves, he must of course be a man; and above all, the most of ladies' dislike a beardless man.

He therefore obtains a razor and soap, and steals away unobserved to the garret or hay loft, and there undergoes this pleasing and important operation: he comes back with his "chin new mowed," a perfect paragon. Next commence the operations of the toilette; he examines his shorn phiz; congratulates himself upon the improvement of his looks; perfumes his hair with sweet scented pomatum, or in the absence of this applies tallow and cologne; his ears are propped up with a collar so stiff that if he moves his head to the right or left, he does it at their peril; his cravat is adjusted a la mode; his handkerchief tastefully dangling in his rear; his gloves in his hand; thus equipped, the bachelor of sixteen, makes his grand entree among the ladies. Here his ears are greeted with sounds unusual; instead of the usual salutation of how do you do Sam? it is how do you do Mr. Puff? Good evening Mr. Puff, says another. We were afraid you would disappoint us Mr. Puff, says a third. After a few common place remarks about the rain or cold, he commences the evening entertainments, by telling the ladies of the latest fashions for frock coats, and the new style of putting on cravats, and asks them to look at his, when to his extreme mortification, and their astonishment, they discover, that his clean cravat so neat and trim, is mounted upon dirty linen, or perhaps no linen at all, and is nothing but a dickey. He recovered himself, he tells them of the fine quality of his trimmings; for you must remember that a watch is a necessary appendage to a young beau; he takes out his watch, (a borrowed one,) every few minutes, and has considerable difficulty in fobbing it; scatters profusely his bon-mots, which he has picked up in the society of his superiors, has a great variety of compliments for the ladies, which he hands out in order to solicit a polite return, and by this means ascertain his own standing in the opinion of these dear and polite creatures.

Thus his vanity is fed, and when he takes leave of these dear souls, he imagines that he is in reality somebody; and wonders why older people should treat him so insignificantly; for he knows as much as any one; he is certainly a man for he shaves, wears a watch, a genteel frock coat, black kid gloves, smokes the real Spanish three centers, takes a horn at the hotel, can gallant the ladies, and they call him Mr. ——. If these are not high claims to good society, he asks what can entitle him to such?

This is a faint sketch of the character and feelings of a young buck, when he makes his debut among the beau monde. These remarks may not, in their full extent, be applicable to every young man; but few, very few, arrive at twenty-one years, without experiencing some of these feelings of self-importance. When the poroxysm ceases, they then view themselves as others have, and can scarcely credit their own senses when they see how narrowly they have escaped a general shipwreck of all their hopes and prospects. In short those who have suffered such foolish inclinations to have unlimited controul over their minds, can see little in the retrospection of their lives on which the mind can dwell with pleasure and satisfaction.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 2, 1830.

✂ New subscribers can be furnished with the Record from the beginning of the present volume.

We are: "a day after the fair," but agreeably to an old custom which is more honourable in the observance than in the breach, we tender our readers "the compliments of the season," &c.

✂ We last week published, from the Worcester Egie, the declination of about half a dozen of the delegates appointed to attend an anti-masonic convention to be held in Massachusetts. The three first of the following are from the same paper, and the others from the journals to which they are credited. The reader will not need the assistance of commentary to discover in them the beggary of anti-ism in the New-England states. The embryo Massachusetts convention has been the theme of exultation for months past, and we here have a specimen of its importance and respectability, among those who are best acquainted with its objects and its character.

✂ We are requested to state that Isaac Goodwin, Esq. wholly declines serving as a delegate to the convention and that he disapproves entirely of the excitement.

✂ Walton Livermore, Esq. of Spencer, whose name appears as one of the delegates, requests us to say that his name is put there "entirely without his consent or approbation, that he is neither mason nor anti-mason, and altogether disapproves of the excitement and will not attend the convention."

✂ Jonas L. Sibley, Esq. of Sutton, wholly declines serving in any convention whatever, either masonic or anti-masonic.

From the Masonick Mirror.

Gen. Jewett has forwarded us the following note which we insert in compliance with his wishes:

Mr. Editor:—I perceive from the last Spy, that my name is on the list of delegates appointed at the anti-masonic meeting, held at the Court House, in Worcester, the last week. This was done without my knowledge or consent; and as I am unwilling to be in any way accessory to getting up an anti-masonic excitement in this quiet community, I beg leave through the medium of your paper respectfully to decline the honour of the appointment. Yours, &c.

IVERS JEWETT.

Fitchburg, Dec. 15, 1829.

From the Lancaster Gazette.

Messrs. Editors. Having read in the Massachusetts Spy of last week the proceedings of a convention in Worcester, and learning that other editors are publishing them, I think it due to myself to send you the following statement of facts, that an unjust impression may not rest on the public mind. I also think it proper that the convention should be apprized of their mistake in appointing me, as one of the fraternity, to attend the proposed state convention.

Until Thursday last I did not even know that a convention had been contemplated, and was then informed of the result of the meeting by an inhabitant of this town, who had been at Worcester. I have never been a member of the masonic fraternity. I have had no share in the popular excitement on the subject of masonry. I have devoted no time to an investigation of the facts relating to it, and have only the superficial and uncertain knowledge which was gained by publications accidentally falling in my way. It has been my firm belief that the individual and professional obligations of christian ministers did not require that they should entangle themselves in this concern. I have also believed that their fellow citizens, if prudent, would not take measures to involve them in it. It has been with me a matter of deliberate conviction, that if an evil existed, and of the magnitude which some have believed, expediency called for other and more sober measures than have been generally used, to be resorted to and relied on for a remedy. In consideration of these things, and with these views, I shall not attend the proposed convention in Boston.

NATHANIEL THAYER.

Lancaster, Dec. 14, 1829.

The above paragraphs show that the "headway" of anti-masonry is a very odd sort of "headway," to say the least of it, and it would not puzzle one of less mathematical genius than Zera Colburn, to determine how long it would require for it, at the same rate, to travel to a very respectful distance beyond every thing that is decent and honorable.

MAYOR OF NEW-YORK. The attempt to elect a Mayor for New York has occasioned some singular scenes in the common council of that city. The old board met on Monday last, and after the new members chosen at the late election had taken their seats it was proposed to proceed to an immediate election of Mayor. About half the board, were the enemies of the Hon. Walter Bowne, the present mayor, and apprehending that it was the intention of his friends to support him for that office again, and that he might obtain it by voting for himself, they objected to his right to vote on a question in which he was interested, and desired him to leave the chair. After much talk the question was voted down by the casting vote of the mayor, and the resolution to proceed to an immediate election carried. In this emergency, seven assistant aldermen took their hats and cloaks, and walked away—leaving less than a quorum of the board, and thereby preventing an election. After an ineffectual attempt by high constable Hays, to find the absent members and procure their return, the board was adjourned by the mayor till the next day, when, a quorum not appearing, a further adjournment till Monday next took place.

In these matters it is hard to tell who is right. The mayor says he knows the duties of the chair—that its rights are fixed by the constitution, and cannot be affected by a resolution of the common council, and he is determined to hand them over to his successor unimpaired. On the other hand, it is asserted that his keeping the chair is a mere political trick, to retain office. In the meantime the people are holding meetings, and praising and condemning both parties. It is said the people are never wrong, so both parties must be both right and wrong.

✂ The honourable Solomon Southwick, esquire, so distinguished for calmness, dignity, and decency, in his editor-

al lucubrations, has worked himself into a very ungovernable passion, because we have thought proper to publish the very able essays under the signature of "REASON. We compassionate the old gentleman, and are excessively sorry that we have occasioned him such unpleasant sensations. We advise him to stay within doors till he has done frothing; people may mistake his disease for the hydrophobia. Alack-a-day, what deadly enemies are reason and anti-masonry!

✂ The American Recorder. This journal is published once a week, at the city of Washington, and is devoted, principally, to Official Documents, Proceedings in Congress, Leading Speeches, Statistics, generally, and such other select articles as are usually found in newspapers: each number contains sixteen large octavo pages, and the terms are five dollars a year. The editor is Mr. GEORGE M. GROUARD, who is represented to be well qualified for the station he has assumed. We have received the second number of the Recorder, and after an examination of it, do not hesitate to add our approbation to the many and merited commendations which have been bestowed upon it. This journal will be found valuable and interesting to all who desire an acquaintance with the history, and the business and political concerns of the country.

✂ The Washington City Chronicle, one of the most ably conducted literary papers in the country, is to be united with the Columbian Register, and hereafter published, under the title of the American Spectator and Washington City Chronicle. The editorial department will be conducted by WALTER COLTON, Esq. The Chronicle is distinguished for an elevated moral and Christian feeling, and eminently merits extensive patronage.

A VIGILANT WATCHMAN. A London paper reports the following proceedings at the Lambeth-street Police Office. The logick and the measures of the watchman were of the true anti-masonic grit, as far as they went—if the "patriotic guardian of the public good" had hanged up the rascals instead of imprisoning them, we should have considered him worthy of being mentioned in the same day with Solomon Southwick:

Four young men, apparently mechanics, were placed at the bar yesterday, and charged before J. Walker, Esq. by Henry Turvey, a watch man on the Mile-end road.

"Them 'ere three men, please your Vership," said Turvey, "I seed a Saturday night, conversing in rich languages as never was heard. So I desired 'em to go on, or I'd shoe 'em on; and they said sardly as they wouldn't be shoe'd—so I look'd 'em up in the watchman."

"Were they intoxicated?" inquired Mr. Walker.

"Can't say as they was," replied the watchman.

"What did the fourth man do?" said Mr. Walker.

"Vy," said Turvey, "jest as I got them 'ere three to the watchman, up comes this feller and axes 'For vot?' and as I was pretty certain as I'd seed him along vith 'em about an hour afore, vy I look'd him up also."

Mr. Walker instantly ordered the dismissal of the whole of the defendants.

The same watchman then placed another man at the bar on a "suspicion of felony." The charge, as detailed, consisted of the watchman hearing a cry of "Stop thief!" and, observing the defendant crossing the road at the same moment, he collared him, and took him to the watch-house; but the person who had been robbed declared he was not the man; nevertheless the watchman, in his wisdom, had him confined till the Monday morning.

The man charged stated that he had numbers to speak to his character as a hard-working weaver, and was utterly ignorant of the charge against him until this moment explained.

Mr. Walker directed he should be immediately liberated.

River Trade of Albany. We have seen a statement of the number of vessels which have paid wharfage at this city, for some years, and have made an estimate of the amount of tonnage (averaging the trips of vessels in the Albany trade, for the years 1821, 1824, and 1829, which is as follows—

	Tonnage.
1821	81,862
1824	97,895
1829	138,647

Adding to this the tonnage of oyster and fruit boats, and an estimate of tonnage in addition to the registered tonnage, the result for 1829 will be 188,957 tons; or by doubling the amount for going and returning, 377,914 tons.

This statement shows the great importance of improving the river navigation, and we think congress cannot do otherwise than lend a favourable ear to the petitions for a grant for that purpose. The increase of the trade since the making of the canals is astonishing, and is a sure augury of continued prosperity, and of the future greatness of Albany.

(Daily Advertiser.)

Death of Dr. Mason. The New-York papers of Monday mention the death of the Rev. John M. Mason, D. D. of that city. He expired (says the N. York Evening Post) on Sunday morning, at the residence of his son, in Fourth-street, in the 60th year of his age. Dr. Mason was a native of New-York, and a graduate of Columbia College. He succeeded his father as pastor of the Scotch Presbyterian church in Cedar-street, and was afterwards transferred to a church built for him in Murray-street. After the death of Bishop Moore, President of Columbia College, Dr. Mason was appointed Provost of that institution; a place which he afterwards left for the Presidency of Carlisle College, in Pennsylvania. His reputation as a theological and classical scholar was high, but he was most eminent for a glowing and vehement eloquence which joined to a powerful voice, a fine elocution, and a commanding presence, produced the most overpowering effect upon his auditors, and rendered him one of the most distinguished and popular preachers of the age. An attack of the paralysis, several years since, obliged him to relinquish the office of President of Carlisle College, since which he has lived in retirement.

Dr. Mason was elected chaplain of the New York State Society of the Cincinnati, and also an honorary member of the society, in the year 1799, and officiated as chaplain from that period until the 4th of July, 1827, when feeble health and bodily infirmity prevented his further attendance. The members of the society have passed a resolution to wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days, in memory of its deceased member.

Capt. Hall's Travels. The last number of the London Quary Review contains a notice of Capt. Basil Hall's travels in the United States; and the reviewer gives it as his opinion that "the instruction for the American people, contained in Capt. Hall's book, has been received in the proper spirit in at least one extensive circle of American society." The editor of the National Gazette remarks upon the opinion thus expressed:—"We venture to reply that there is no circle of American society, properly so called, great or small, in which the book is not viewed with utter contempt; and we believe that it has excited the same feeling in the great majority of its readers in Great Britain."

[N. Y. Statesman.]

Colombia. It is very evident that fresh troubles are brewing in Colombia. Information has recently been received from various parts of that republic which leads to the belief that Bolivar and his partisans are making preparations to change the form of government into a monarchy. One project is to crown Bolivar, and marry him to a daughter of the Duke of Orleans—the crown to be hereditary, if Bolivar should leave issue—if not, to descend to the Orleans line. Another project is to make Bolivar president for life. In either event, it is believed that Venezuela will separate itself from the republic. [N. Y. Com. Adv.]

Champagne. A company of Frenchmen have contracted with some farmers in Herefordshire, for a considerable quantity of the juice of certain pears, which is to be sent to them in London immediately after it has been expressed, or before fermentation has commenced. With the recently expressed juice they made last year an excellent brisk wine, resembling the finest sparkling champagne; and we are told that the speculation was so productive, that they have resolved considerably to extend their manufactory. [Gaz. of Health.]

Travelling Titles. The Washington Chronicle, speaking of titles, says, that some time since, 25 gentlemen, strangers to each other, assembled together at dinner, on board a steamboat on the Ohio. They were principally from the states of Kentucky, Tennessee and Ohio. At dinner the captain of the boat said, addressing one of the company whom he knew—"General, shall I help you to a piece of roast beef?"—upon which, 23 out of the whole number, replied to his civility, affirmatively or negatively.

It appears from the following notice in a Welch journal, that an over-sowing house is not at all times, a desideratum: "It will be impossible to open the Cardiff Theatre this season, the late rains having inundated it to the depth of nearly six feet, and the water being at present above the stage."

The Cap Sheaf. There is a family living in this town, and only about three miles from our office, that can dine in three states without travelling three rods to accomplish it; and a common three foot table set in their front yard, might have two of its corners in Massachusetts, one in New-York, and one in Vermont. [Williamstown Adv.]

The Dutch government have offered a reward of 50,000 guilders, equal to 90,000 dollars, for the recovery of the jewels stolen from the palace of the Prince of Orange, and the discovery of the thief; or half that sum for the jewels alone.

Independence of the Press. An Ohio editor declined publishing an obituary notice of two columns' length, on the death of an infant, three months old: deeming it rather too long; and for which refusal the writer stopped his paper.

John Clay, esq. brother of Henry Clay, late secretary of state, died on board the steam-boat Rover, about twenty miles below Memphis, on the Mississippi, on the 10th ult.

The Downingtown (Pennsylvania) Independent Journal says, "It was proposed to Governor Wolf, that in order to conciliate publick favour, he should be careful not to appoint masons to office. 'Sir, (said the Governor) I would scorn myself, if I could descend to such means to court favour. I will not so much as know whether applicants are masons or not,—it will neither be a disqualification nor a recommendation. If the people differ from me, they will soon have an opportunity to express their sentiments, and I assure you (he added) it will not grieve me to return to private life.' Such language indicates a firm and honourable mind, which will descend to nothing improper, to obtain a fleeting and unsubstantial popularity."

From the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, Dec. 23.

LANDING OF THE FATHERS. Yesterday, being the 200th anniversary of the landing of the fathers at Plymouth, was observed by the New-England Society of this city, with appropriate demonstrations of gratitude and joy. At 7 o'clock, P. M. joined by a numerous concourse of their fellow citizens, they assembled in the Brick Church, Beekman-street, to hear an oration from their friend and associate, Colonel S. L. Knapp, esq. The house was well filled,—not with your miscellaneous, nondescript geniuses, of every continent and nation, but with genuine, full blooded, and unquestionable Yankees. Fifty congregations more, of the same materials, might be rallied here on an emergency;—for though "there are Yankees every where," they are to be found in the greatest numbers where there is the best opportunity of accumulating "the needful."

The exercises of the evening were introduced with the anthem of "O praise God in his holiness," which was followed with prayer by the Rev. Dr. Spring. The following hymn, composed for the occasion, was then sung. In the tune of Old Hundred.

Wild was the day, the wintry sea
Moaned sadly on New-England's strand,
When first, the thoughtful and the free,
Our fathers, trod the desert land.
They little thought how pure a light
In time should gather round that day;
How love should keep their memory bright,
How wide a realm their sons should sway.
Green are their bays, but greener still
Shall round their spreading fame be wreathed;
And regions, now untrod, shall thrill
With reverence, when their names are breathed.
Till where the sun, with softer fire,
Looks on the vast Pacific's sleep,
The children of the Pilgrim Sires
This hallowed day, like us, shall keep.

The orator of the day then rose, and addressing the audience by the significant name of brethren, entertained them with an address of at least an hour in length, which was full of happy allusions and interesting facts relating to the history of New-England. He traced the origin of that bold adventure which has peopled all its states with intelligent, hardy, and virtuous citizens, to remote causes that the persecutions which constrained our pilgrim fathers to tempt the hazards of an unknown sea, and a howling wilderness. He thought this remarkable event, certainly one of the most remarkable in history, could be traced directly back to the enterprising spirit enkindled by the crusades, while the invention of printing and gunpowder, the translation of the Scriptures, and the Reformation, contributed greatly to hasten its fulfilment. He spoke of the character of the pilgrims, their principles, their perils, and their institutions. It was a memorable fact, that as early as the 17th year of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay, a law was passed requiring every town with a population of fifty families, to establish a school for reading and writing, and every town of one hundred families, a grammar school. In 1683 a law was passed requiring every town of more than 300 families to support two grammar schools, and two schools for reading and writing. He traced the influence of such institutions, and such men, in shaping the destinies of the country,—paying, en passant, a very handsome compliment to the Dutch settlers, who first peopled New-York and its vicinity. Towards the close of his address he alluded with much force and effect to those modern "reformers," "who would destroy, if they could, the virtues and hopes of the world;" would pull down our churches, banish the clergy, abolish the institution of marriage, and all the endearing relations which result from it. In conclusion he spoke of the enterprise, intelligence, and virtue of the Yankees, their publick spirit—"born for others as well as themselves." The exercises were concluded by singing the following hymn (original).

With joy I heard them say,
When roving far abroad,
On this their landing day,
We'll praise the Pilgrims' God:
I knew the cry,
I'll join the song,
Thy courts we'll throng,
O thou Most High!
This day let all awake,
And sing the mighty deed,
Who first for Zion's sake,
O'er raging oceans fed.
Had not our God
Preserved that flock,
Safe on the rock,
They ne'er had trod.
At once their temples rose,
Our schools were founded then,
Nor could their mightiest foes
Withstand those valiant men;
But vain their skill,
And vain their sword,
Had not the Lord
Upheld them still.
Peace to that holy ground!
That consecrated spot!
The first our fathers found,
Where tyrants troubled not.
We'll sound abroad,
Where'er we roam,
The Pilgrims' home,
The Pilgrim's God!

THEATRE. We have visited the theatre but once this week, and that was last evening. The house was crowded to excess. The entertainments were The King and Deserter, an old ballad about George Barnwell, by Mr. Page, and the farce of Animal Magnetism. The drama went off well, and was highly applauded. We have no time to speak particularly of the characters; we may say, however, that The Deserter, by Mr. Duffy, was admirably well done. The drama is an interesting one, and the scenery is new and beautiful. Page's attempt to sing was a failure. We did not stop to see the farce.

POETRY.

THE CARRIERS' ADDRESS TO THE PATRONS
OF THE
AMERICAN MASONICK RECORD
AND ALBANY SATURDAY MAGAZINE.

January 1, 1830.

How like the wind we hasten on
Into the vortex of lost years,
Where all our bright young hopes are gone
Like errant stars, to other spheres!
We look back to them, as we deemed
Their light would meet our eyes once more,
In all the joy with which they beamed
On the heart's yet unwasted store.

Then we look forward, with a bold
And restless gaze, upon the field
Of Hope—and there, perchance, the cold
Signet of Fate has left unsealed
Another year of joy, like this,
Refreshing to our tedious way
As waters in the wilderness—
As sunset to the weary day.

At Tisri's feast, the pious race
Of Israel, in their Holy Land,
Which God pronounced his dwelling place,
Made greetings with the heart and hand,
And crowned the joy with gifts and songs.
Long let the generous custom live!
To every bright one yet belongs
The heart to sing, or hand to give.

And, like them, let our joyous songs
And gifts of gratitude be paid,
In this glad hour, to which belongs
The example such high hands have made;
Yet if no joy hath crowned the year,
No smile of plenty cheered thy lot,
Sing thou with me— withhold the cheer,
But never leave the song forgot.

Look back—look back—where, like young dreams,
The season brought its offspring forth,
Giving soft music to the streams,
And fervour to the breathing North!
Then call to mind the bending vine,
Yielding its gladness to thy taste—
And say, if all this year of thine
Has been a dark and dreary waste?

Have not the broad green fields been clothed
With plenty, as a robe of state?
Have not our doubting hearts been soothed
When Autumn bent beneath the weight
Of vintage,—and the sun looked down
With warmth indulgent on them all?
Who, then, can hesitate to own
Allegiance to this festival?

Nor are these all. Fortune hath sent—
Or, rather, Providence hath granted—
Rest to some minds, and the content
For which some aching bosoms panted.
Hymen has clipped the wings of Cupid,
And chained him to his sore distraught,
And given to many a dotting stupid
The wedded happiness he sought.

And Anti Masonry has blown
Its "tempest in a teapot," too;
But vainly does it shout and groan
Where Common Sense has aught to do.
Foiled in its speculations here,
It lifts its head in other fields,
Striving to live another year
On the scant food Corruption yields.

Peace to its ashes, when it dies!
No other spirit of its kind
Has e'er departed from our skies,

And left such mournful ones behind.
But bury it beneath the wave
Of some unfathomable, pent,
And dismal ocean—which may save
Its whiskers from embezzlement.

A year hath gone—a year hath come,
Over whose yet untrodden path
Vision is dark, and Fate is dumb;—
But let us doubt not that it hath
The same kind blessings yet in store
Which made us grateful in the past.
Thus Hope will prompt. Thus will her doot
Be left inviting to the last.

Let joy come with it,—and forget
The bitterness which has gone by.
Fate has enough of anguish yet,
To bring, in its own time, the sigh.
Wisdom and happiness are caught
Ere they pass from us, or are lost;
And he who wins them wastes no thought
On all the grievings they have cost.

Friends of the Printer's boy! to you.
This homely lay is sung; and cold
Must be the heart which will eschew
The precedent it has of old.
The feast which brings the infant year—
The Tisri of all tribes that live,—
Why not reciprocate its cheer?
Ours is the song—'tis yours to give.

OLD WINTER IS COMING.

Old Winter is coming again—alack!
How icy and cold is he!
He cares not a pin for a shivering back—
He's a saucy old chap to white and black—
He whistles his chills with a wonderful knack,
For he comes from a cold countree!

A witty old fellow this Winter is—
A mighty old fellow for glee!
He cracks his jokes on the pretty sweet miss—
The wrinkled old maiden, unfit to kiss,
And freezes the dew of their lips—for this
Is the way for old fellows like he!

Old Winter's a frolicsome blade I wot—
He is wild in his humour, and free!
He'll whistle along, for "the want of his thought,"
And set all the warmth of our furs at naught,
And ruffle the laces by pretty girls bought—
A frolicsome fellow is he!

Old Winter is blowing his guests along,
And merrily shaking the tree!
From morning 'till night he will sing his song—
Now moaning, and short—now howling, and long,
His voice is loud—for his lungs are strong—
A merry old fellow is he!

Old Winter's a tough old fellow for blows,
As tough as ever you see!
He will trip up our trotters, and rend our clothes,
And stiffen our limbs from our fingers to toes—
He minds not the cries of his friends or his foes—
A tough old fellow is he!

A cunning old fellow is Winter, they say,
A cunning old fellow is he!
He peeps in the crevices day by day,
To see how we're passing our time away—
And marks all our doings, from grave to gay—
I'm afraid he is peeping at me! NASHUA BARD.

ARAB SONGS.

The youth of the hero, though quenched in war,
Than eld of the craven is dearer far.

Chorus.

A fair made for the brave;
A deep brand for the slave,
Who can shun the death-strife,
For contemptible life.

Why pause ye, friends? Our daughters urge
On, though their song our dying dirge.

Chorus.

Our charge the spring torrent,
The wild rushing current;
Our blade the red lightning,
Our havoc o'er-bright'ning.

Nor spare thy noble blood,
Thou chieftain Arab free!
Thy boy but marks the flood,
That he may bleed like thee.

Chorus.

If war be thy feast,
If sloth be thy fast,
Then not thou the least,
Nor honoured the last.

Welcome the cry of the foeman to war!
My brand shall gleam o'er him his fatal star.

Chorus.

Whose the desert couch
Ne'er to foe may crouch,
Thick though as the sands
Charge the rival bands.

Strive nobly, martyr, and be free!
Heaven opes, and Houris strive for thee.

Chorus.

None shall wed the flying slave;
E'en dogs shall bay the dastard knave.

TO * * *

BY R. MONTGOMERY.

Oh, Lady! in my boyish hour,
Perchance thou see'st me gay as young,
The happy slave of Pleasure's power,
With rapture in my heart and tongue:

Yet think not thus I ever seem,
As though no grief did e'er annoy;—
There's darkness in the brightest dream,
And sorrow in the sweetest joy!

Alone amid the world I move,
With scarce a smile or tear for me,
And not a heart to share the love
Of unaffected sympathy:

Without it, what can realms bestow
Of all that mingling natures feel?—
It is to kindred mind we owe
The rapture Time delights to steal.

But may no cloudy shade intrude
Upon the sunshine of the lot,
And all that dims my gayest mood
In thy fresh feeling be forgot:

May Heaven attend thee! wheresoe'er
The winging years may waft thee on;
And nothing mar that blissful air
All eyes have loved to look upon!

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED.

The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgements for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength, and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the sackings. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding house keepers—to the masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee, now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 183 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

POPULAR EXCITEMENTS.

NO. XII.

From the examination of various excitements, and their general operations, we are now called to observe the peculiar and individual force of another, as concentrated upon the fortunes of a single public benefactor—our lamented CLINTON. It is not for me to pen the biography of CLINTON—that task is reserved for more able hands, but a glance at his public life is enough to wring contrition from the blackest heart that participated in engendering the wrongs he suffered. Without pursuing the detail of these, I will advert to the part he bore in obtaining, for debtors, an exemption from the enormous costs which were formerly thrown upon them. When the jurisdiction of our justices of the peace extended only to debts of twenty-five dollars, it was CLINTON, who had ever the welfare of his fellow-men at heart, that dared to urge an extension of that jurisdiction to twice the sum mentioned. The justice of the measure was seen, the law was amended to meet the exigency, and a general relief of the labouring classes of community was the immediate consequence. Moved by a just feeling for the benefit thus conferred, the breasts of the people were just beginning to swell with gratitude to their benefactor, when the disappointed envy of a few most unworthy members of the Bar was brought violently into action, to counteract the feeling, and destroy, if possible, the praiseworthy character of the deed that had produced it. The enactment just mentioned, deprived the legal profession of much of its anticipated wealth; and while many of its members submitted with pleasure to the privation, which was so evidently necessary to the general prosperity, there were others who, for “public good,” called loudly in question both the right and the motive of the man who had offended. They appealed, with impassioned zeal, to the people—to that very populace whose benefit had been consulted, and whose relief had just been accomplished, for assistance to remove far from them the dangerous man they were desirous to reward. Assuming, exclusively, the character of public guardians, who laboured only for the destruction of wickedness, an audience was at length obtained. When this was accomplished, the principle of irritation which had been sown, brought actively into operation the unsuspecting indignation of the populace against their benefactor; and the hydra of faction, surmounting the storm, strove, but too successfully, by artful approaches and secret intrigue, to mount to power and trample upon worth. Astonished at their own success, the aspirants assiduously applied themselves to the completion of their work, ere the delusive cloud should pass from before the eyes of the populace. They succeeded: the public benefactor was proscribed and contemned. CLINTON, by the avowed guardians of public good, was thrust from the post of usefulness, in his native state. That state was subjected to the wild rage of phrensy and misrule, by the efforts of aspirants, and CLINTON was driven from her legislative halls, from the council board of her sages, and from all public participation in her confidence.

To this season of feverish excitement succeeded one of deliberate reflection. The passions, exhausted by exertion sunk quietly to repose, and reason once again mounted to her native ascendancy. The variegated notes of popular clamour were instantly changed, for expressions of the deepest contrition. The delusion that had been practised was broadly manifested, in all its features, and the people became once more true to themselves. The proscribed benefactor of his species was recalled from retirement, again invested with authority, and once more intrusted with the official guardianship of the state. From this post, in the full career of usefulness and in the entire enjoyment of the confidence of the virtuous and the good, he sank to his honoured grave. He is gone:—but the few who, in revenge for the loss of a legal fee, had wasted half their lives, in exciting the honest populace against him, were too much awed by the recollections of his usefulness to manifest their joy at the event. It was reserved, exclusively, for one of the principal promoters of the present excitement, to express his satisfaction at the death of CLINTON; and this stands recorded a solitary instance of the spirit of darkness disgorging its bitterness upon so hallowed a tomb. But let this history recall the fact that popular excitements may accomplish what right can never approve. Let it not be forgotten that CLINTON, though “Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,

And panting time toiled after him in vain,”

was thrust down to momentary oblivion, by the aspirants who sought, in a moment of disorder, to draw the affections of the populace from the man, whose memory they now so much “delight to honour.”

REASON.

NO. XIII.

From the range originally prescribed to these numbers, it only remains for me now to close the series, by some general remarks upon the subject they were intended to embrace. They have grown to an extent far beyond the primitive design of the writer; but it was early discovered, after their commencement, that the fund of material was so abundant as to render an entire use of it impossible, while the selection of portions for the present purpose was rendered doubly difficult by the bulk of the whole. The variegated commotions of the long period of years between the early dawn of christianity, in the world, and the dates of English history, to which I have adverted; the devastating and ruinous excitements, engendered by the crusades during the three hundred years of their continuance, and the appalling scenes of blood, carnage and conflagration, produced by the French revolution, have all been necessarily neglected, as forming, separately, a ponderous history, that could not be abridged to the limits of essays like these.

In prosecuting my labours, I have not, knowingly, misstated a fact, or drawn a perverted conclusion. My object has been to serve the community of which I am a member, by historical illustrations of the dangerous and delusive tendency of popular excitements. It is remarked, by Dr. Johnson, that faction seldom leaves a man honest, however it may find him; and it is perhaps unnecessary to add, that the present excitement has furnished conclusive testimony, in support of such an opinion. The purely delicate mind would scarcely be able to frame a more frightful picture of its desolating effects, than has been manifested in the heat of the present commotion. The same actors who have so frequently in this excitement sported with human frailty, have not hesitated to invade the sanctity of private friendship, nor the still more hallowed endowments which unite the adorers of heaven around the altar of their God. Against such invasions, to war, is the holiest pursuit of philanthropy; and against such I have exerted my pen. If a prejudice of education, or a bias of judgement has been corrected by my labours, I shall feel that my reward is complete.

ANTI-MASONRY.

“Adversity acquaints a man with strange bedfellows,” says Shakspeare, and curiosity acquaints a man with strange sights, say we. The last thing of the sort which has affected our visual organs and risible muscles, is the four or five scores of venerable Bettys and promising striplings who call themselves members of the anti-masonick convention. We perceive among them, men of sense, and men whose knowledge would not equal that of a certain long-eared animal—men who are undoubtedly honest, and others, of whom, as we cannot speak well, it is best to say nothing—men who are good old patriots in their dotage, and men who will thank us for not putting their motives in print. The whole assembly is about as wise, queer, and ridiculous, and convened for about as good a purpose, as would be one of a hundred old ladies to ascertain whether tea is not poisoned by being packed in casks lined with metal. Success to free inquiry! From the extensive preparations made for arranging rules and regulations and all that sort of affairs, we opine that the convention will not hatch in less than a week or two—though one speaker seemed to consider it nonsense to appoint a committee to ascertain whether the disclosures concerning masonry are true—he thought it as clear as that the sun was above the horizon at noon-day. That gentleman’s faculty of discriminating between outcry and evidence, is by no means enviable.

When Mather Byles lived at the North End, he made frequent complaints to the Selectmen, of an impassable slough in the vicinity of his domicile, but without effect. One morning he saw one of that improvident body floundering and panting, up to his armpits in the mud. “Oho!” cried the reverend father, “I am glad to see you stirring in that matter.” Call anti-masonry the mud-hole, and the convention the municipal officer, and it may be addressed thus: “Mr. President, and Gentlemen—having undertaken to work, as you pretend, for the public good, you find yourselves in the midst of the worst nuisance that has ever disturbed the peace of our country. Do not make it worse, nor leave it as bad as you found it; but cover up the putrefaction, that the abomination thereof may not offend our nostrils, nor check our useful doings. After you have voted anti-masonry a great curse, as all honest men must, you have our leave to play the rogues in every department of public interest. You may debate upon politics, and spout nonsense as long as your brains will hold out in discharging that agreeable commodity; or as long as your purses will defray the expense of your disinterested labours.” This speech will doubtless have a powerful effect, and we shall soon expect to hear that anti-masonry is in as bad odour with the convention as it always has been among men of common sense and decency.

CELEBRATION.

(Communicated.)

On Monday evening, Dec. 28th, the brethren of Hudson Lodge celebrated the festival of St. John the Evangelist. At an early hour the members assembled, many of them accompanied by their ladies. A large number of respectable citizens attended the public exercises of the evening, and retired well persuaded that the calumnies and abuse heaped upon masonry are without foundation. The services were opened by a solemn and appropriate address to the throne of grace, by the Rev. Joshua Flagg, K. T. and C. of Greenwich Village Encampment, in Massachusetts; after which an excellent address was pronounced by Br. Richard Carrique. A few amateurs in sacred song enlivened the services with appropriate masonic anthems, and impressed into the audience that soft harmony of feeling which unites us in the bonds of charity and love.

The services being concluded, the brethren, their ladies, and a number of invited guests, partook of an excellent supper, prepared in the lodge room, and departed at an early hour, much gratified with the order, harmony and good fellowship which reigned throughout the evening.

In conclusion, my brethren, I would not forget to mention that much confidence is placed in your candour and charity, which will ever prompt you to cast the veil of forgetfulness over the imperfections of those who preside over the lodge. Thus may we live and act, and experience that comely order

CHARACTER.

From the Commercial Advertiser of December 29.

JOHN M. MASON.

The death of the Rev. John M. Mason was announced yesterday from several of the pulpits. He expired yesterday morning, in the 60th year of his age. It is now several years since infirmity has confined this distinguished scholar and divine within the immediate circle of his own family. He has been thought of by the world as one whose example and reputation lived after him, and were likely to live while genius, eloquence, learning, powerful and commanding talent, and true piety are held in remembrance. It may be safely asserted, that since the days of Whitfield, no preacher of equal energy and popularity has declared the whole counsel of his Divine Master from an American pulpit. As an extemporaneous expounder of the scriptures, he was unrivalled. At the communion table he was unequalled by his brethren, as those who have witnessed and felt the effect of his pathetic and glowing appeals to the participants will with one voice attest. He carried them with him from the garden of Gethsemane to the last supper and to the cross, awaking alternately feelings sublime and tender: the multitude was in tears, and the hardened and thoughtless wished themselves "like these Christians." No one who heard him speak in public, ever forgot his manner, which it was dangerous to imitate, and is impossible to describe. His memory, however, will not be preserved by the breath of tradition alone. He has left sermons, orations and controversial writings, stamped with the peculiar impress of his own mind, which may challenge comparison with any similar productions of the age; and in which are to be found passages of the highest and least attainable order of eloquence;—such as alone would make his name live in after ages, independent of the close reasoning, the sturdy development of truth, the ingenious illustration, and the overpowering appeals to the reason and the immortal hopes of man, which are to be found in these remains.

Dr. Mason was the son of the Rev. John Mason, formerly pastor of the Scottish Presbyterian church in Cedar-street. He succeeded his father in that pulpit, where his labours are too well known to all the old inhabitants of this city, to render it necessary for us to dwell upon them in this brief notice. The church in Murray-street was built for him, where he was followed by part of his old congregation; and where his usefulness and his fame increased for a number of years, attracting all denominations, and commanding admiration even from those who differed from him most widely in doctrinal points. He presided over a theological seminary, which it was his pride to support, not only by assiduous labours, but by great personal sacrifices. It was emphatically his own. Many of the most popular and excellent ministers in the Presbyterian and Dutch churches came from this seminary. Dr. M. had always taken a deep interest in the sound and classical education of youth. The grammar school which flourished for many years under Mr. John Borland and other able teachers, was established and supported by his efforts in conjunction with those of a few other scholars and divines, who saw the necessity of raising the standard of elementary discipline and instruction. It is no doubt owing in a considerable measure to their efforts, that good classical schools have since become numerous in the city. On the retirement of Dr. Johnson, of Connecticut, from the Presidency of Columbia College, a new arrangement was made by the Trustees; the late Rev. Dr. Harris being appointed President, with limited duties assigned to the office, and Dr. Mason being named Provost. In this capacity, he was in fact the efficient Executive of the College, while he regularly heard the recitations of the Senior Class in the critical classic authors. For six years, we believe, he discharged these duties with indefatigable zeal. But he had undertaken labours too great even for his own Herculean strength. This will be easily perceived, when it is considered that he preached two elaborate original discourses on every Sabbath which required much preliminary study; and was burdened with all the necessary cares of a clergyman, who has the welfare of his congregation deeply at heart; that he attended three long recitations in college weekly, when he always came prepared to illustrate the author with all the stores of criticism gathered by severe research—and in fact to lecture, with a fulness of information, a variety of brilliant reference, and a thorough explanation of the subject, which few ex-cathedratic discourses furnish; that he had much to occupy his time in the government of the institution; and that he also regularly lectured at the Theological Seminary, the wants of which, and his persevering determination to sustain it, engrossed much of his attention and harassed his mind. His family was large, and his hospitality was always great. Under the pressure of so many important and unremitting engagements, it is surely not to be wondered at that his health gave way. That the vigour of the mind should not have been impaired by such constant tension for so great a length of time, is truly wonderful. But the animal machinery gave way; and never was repaired. After finding it necessary to give up his different charges in succession, he accepted an invitation from the trustees of Dickinson College, at Carlisle, (Pennsylvania,) to preside over that institution, which had gone to decay from unfortunate circumstances. For some years he fulfilled this trust faithfully: but his health continued to decline. He has latterly resided in this city in the bosom of his family. His death was, we may suppose, looked upon as an approaching event; but we believe that the immediate illness which produced it was of short duration.

Those who heard Dr. M. thunder in the pulpit, or saw him merely in the discharge of official duty, may have inferred that his character was marked by austerity. Such was not the case, as his friends, his pupils, and all the subjects of his wise and self-sacrificing benevolence can attest. He was kind-hearted, conciliating and courteous; and won from all who knew him as much love as respect. When the gigantic edifice of his physical and mental strength gave way, many a tear was shed at beholding its ruins; and thousands will pay the tribute of sorrow now, when they hear that their benefactor has departed from the flesh.

LATE KING OF MADAGASCAR.

Antwerp papers received at the office of the Boston Daily Advertiser, furnish the following notice of RADAMA, late king of Madagascar, of whose intelligence, and exertions to improve the condition of his people, favourable mention has been made in the Journals of Europe and this country. Boston Bulletin.

Radama, whose death the Madagascans deplore, was of small stature and of an athletic form; his hair black and curled, his complexion copper, his eyes small, black, sparkling, and of a severe expression; his nose large and projecting; his mouth large and much ornamented. His gait was proud, his disposition impetuous and despotick; he loved war, which he always prosecuted at the head of his armies.

At the age of sixteen, Radama let it be foreseen what he was destined to be. Two of his brothers, having pretensions to the crown of Emirne, he caused them to be despatched. A few years after, he undertook to dethrone the powerful Queen of Bombetoch, and at 22 years of age, he was proclaimed King of Madagascar. He was victorious at all points where he directed his arms, and where he employed his troops disciplined in the European manner. He loved much to hear conversation upon great captains. One of his first questions on seeing an European, was to demand news of Napoleon, of his victories, &c. He loved all Frenchmen, whose language he had learned. He always called them "brave and faithful." Radama was ambitious. He aspired to unite upon his head all the crowns of Madagascar. Already he had subjugated many princes, and possessed an immense territory when death surprised him at 36 years of age.

At Emirne, in the midst of a plain thirty leagues long, where he had built a magnificent palace, there was a hill of about fifty feet in height. He said that it spoilt his prospect. One day when his favourites had directed the conversation to this subject, he suddenly gave an order to send eight thousand men to level this hill; and what is most extraordinary is, that it was done in four days. I learn from an English traveller who had brought him a pair of globes, that Radama, after a study of three hours, got acquainted with the form of the earth, and with the motions of the planets, and that he afterwards spoke of them with accuracy. He knew English; he loved luxury; he was always well dressed, and wore the French uniform.

Radama was born to regenerate his nation. He had civilized them as far as the short duration of his reign permitted. He had given some laws to his country. He had established custom houses in the maritime towns, and he would have created a military marine. He had already laid some foundation of a naval power. He had just traversed eight hundred leagues of country, and was about to renew the war against Bombetoch, when he fell ill. He refused all kinds of assistance, and died in a few days from the first attack of his disease.

We often pretend to fear what we really despise, and more often to despise what we really fear.

THE GATHERER.

FRAGMENTS OF AN ANTEDILUVIAN DIARY.

BY MISS JEWELRY.

*Reflections of Methuselah in his youth—in middle age—
And in Old Age.*

To day I am a hundred years old. How blissful are the feelings of boyhood! My senses are acute as the tree with the shrinking leaf. My blood bounds through my veins as the river pours through the valley, rejoicing in its strength. Life lies before me like another plain of Shinar—vast, unoccupied, and inviting—I will fill it with achievements and pleasure! In about sixty years it will be time for me to think of marrying; my kinswoman Zillah will by that time have emerged from girlhood; she already gives promise, I hear, of comeliness and discretion. Twenty years hence I will pay a visit to her father, that I may see how she grows; meanwhile, I will build a city to receive her when she becomes my wife.

Nearly three centuries have passed since my marriage. Can it be! It seems but yesterday since I sported like a young antelope round my father's tent, or, climbing the dark cedars, nestled like a bird among the thick boughs—and now I am a man in authority, as well as in the prime of life. I lead out my trained servants to the fight, and sit head of the council, beneath the very tree where, as an infant, my mother laid me to sleep. Jazed, my youngest horn, a lovely babe of thirty summers, is dead: but I have four goodly sons remaining. And my three daughters are fair as their mother, when I first met her in the Acacia grove, where now stands one of my city watch towers. They are the pride of the plain, no less for their acquirements than beauty. No damsel carries the pitcher from the fountain with the grace of Adah, none can dry the summer fruit like Azubah—and none can fashion a robe of skins with the skill of Milcah. When their cousin Mahaleel has seen another half century, he shall take the choice of the three.

My eight hundredth birth-day! And now I feel the approach of old age and infirmity. My beard is become white as the blossoms of the almond tree. I am constrained to use the staff when I journey; the stars look less bright than formerly; the flowers smell less odorous; I have laid Zillah in the tomb of the rock; Milcah has gone to the dwelling of Mahaleel; my sons take my place at the council, and in the field; all is changed. The long future has become the short past. The earth is full of violence; the ancient and the honourable are sinking beneath the young and the vicious. The giants stalk through the length and breadth of the land, where once dwelt a quiet people; all is changed. The beasts of the field and the monsters of the deep growl and press on us with unwonted fury; traditions, visions, and threatenings are abroad. What fearful doom hangs over this fair world, I know not; it is enough that I am leaving it; yet another five or eight score years, and the tale will be complete. But have I, in very deed, trod this earth nearly a thousand years! It is false, I am yet a boy. I have had a dream—a long, long, busy dream; of buying and selling; marrying and giving in marriage; of building and planting; feasting and warring; sorrowing and rejoicing; loving and hating; but it is false to call it a life. Go to—it has been a vision of the night; and now that I am awake, I will forget it. Lamech, my son, how long is it since we planted the garden of oaks beside the river! Was it not yesterday! "My father, dost thou sport! Those oaks cast a broad shadow when my sister carried me beneath them in her arms, and wore me chaplets of their leaves." Thou art right, my son; and I am old. Lead me to thy mother's tomb, and there leave me to meditate. What am I the better for my past length of being! Where will be its records when I am gone! They are venter—on all sides. Will those many towers fall! Will these golden plains become desolate! Will the children that call no father forget! The seer utter dark sayings upon their harps, when they sing of the future; they say our descendants shall be men of dwindled stature; that the years of their lives shall be contracted to the span of our boyhood; but what is that future to me! I have listened to the tales of Paradise—nay, in the blue distance, I have seen the dark tops of its cedars. I have heard the solemn melodies of Jubal, when he sat on the sea shore, and the sound of the waves mingled with his harping. I have seen angels the visitants of men—I have seen an end of all perfection: what is the future to me!

ANECDOTES OF NAPOLEON.

From the fourth series of M. de Bourrienne's Memoirs.

Bonaparte was not inclined by nature to esteem mankind, the more intimately he knew them, the more heartily he despised them. This unfavourable opinion in the human heart, to which experience often gives birth, was in his case justified by some striking examples. His severity was the result of a maxim, which he frequently repeated:—"There are two levers that act most powerfully on mankind—interest and fear." Perhaps one of Bonaparte's greatest misfortunes was a disbelief in the existence of friendship. How often have I heard him say—"Friendship is but an empty word;—I love nobody; no not even my brothers; Joseph perhaps a little; and yet if I love him, it is merely from habit,—because he is the eldest. Then, Duroc;—yes, I like him too;—but why! His disposition suits mine;—he is cold, harsh and unbending—he never weeps. To me the friendship of others is a matter of indifference;—I know that I have no real friends;—as long as I am what I am, I shall have no scarcity of seeming ones. Mark my words, Bourrienne,—leave women to weep and whine;—it is their business. I hate sensibility; man should be firm;—his heart should be firm; he that is otherwise, must meddle neither with war nor government."

Bonaparte cherished the most rooted aversion for the sanguinary leaders of the revolution, and particularly for regicides. I have frequently heard him say to Cambaceres, while he gently pinched his ear, as if to soften the bitterness of the jest by this playful and habitual familiarity,—"My poor Cambaceres! I fear I can do nothing for you; but if ever the Bourbons come back, your business is settled:—you will certainly be hanged!" A forced smile would on such occasions contract the ghastly features of Cambaceres, imparting to them and expression that it would be no less difficult than disagreeable to portray. This smile was generally the sole reply hazarded by the second consul, who, notwithstanding, once in my presence, answered with a movement of pettish anger—"Come, come; have done with your ill-timed jests."

Bonaparte was one day walking in the gardens of Malmaison with Madame de Clermont Tonnere (now Madame de Talarie) whose lively and shrewd remarks always afford him infinite pleasure. Suddenly interrupting her, he bluntly accosted her in the following manner;—"Madame de Clermont Tonnere, what is your opinion of me?" This unexpected address rendered the answer a matter of some delicacy as well as difficulty. "General," replied the lady, after a moment of hesitation—"I may compare you to a skillful architect, who does not allow his construction to be examined till entirely finished. Precisely so with you: you build behind a scaffolding, which you will dash to the ground when your work is done."

"Among other peculiarities, Buonaparte could never endure the sight of a coloured gown—particularly one of a dark shade. A fat woman was also one of his sovereign antipathies. He rarely invited to his fetes or dinners females in a state of pregnancy, to whose society he always evinced the most decided repugnance. Politeness to the fair sex was not habitual to his character: he was little calculated for the utterance of those soft nothings which custom has familiarised to the female ears. His compliments were often of the most uncouth description. At one time he would say to a lady—"Good God! how red your arms are!" To another—"What an abominable head-dress!" Or—"Who can have trussed up your hair in that manner!" Or—"How soiled your dress is! Do you never change it! I have seen you in that at least twenty times." Spite of this bluntness, he possessed every requisite for forming what in the language of the world is termed a man of amiable manners—with the exception of the will.

Amongst the private instructions given to me by Bonaparte, the reader will probably be struck with the following rather singular order:—"At night" said he "you will enter my bed-chamber as seldom as possible. Never awaken me when you have good news to announce. With good news there is no necessity to hurry. When, on the contrary, you are the depositary of evil tidings, rouse me instantly; for on such occasions there is no time to be lost." Bonaparte frequently found the beneficial results of this calculation, which, though differing from that generally adopted, was really just.

DIVORCES IN TURKEY.

According to the Turkish law, the husband alone is the arbiter of a separation—a menas et toro; and he can sever the connubial tie at his own good pleasure, provided always that he be of age and sound in intellect. The sentence of divorce is laconic enough, the Turk probably opining that, on such occasions, the less said the sooner mended, and either of the following formulæ suffices to erect the partition-wall between man and wife. "Thou art cast off;" or, "Carry thy fecundity far away from my presence;" or, "Go, count thy months;" or, "I cast thee away from me," with "thy lap, thy breast, thy head," or "thy countenance." But from the moment the doom has passed his lips, he himself forfeits all personal claim on his spouse; whilst the latter is compelled to isolate herself from all society throughout the succeeding three months, during which period such conjugal rights as affect the laws of inheritance and the husband's powers over the wife remain unimpaired. He is, however, entitled within this space to take her back again, even though she may prove contumacious, and to incarcerate her until she consent to live with him once more. During her confinement he is also at liberty to visit her at intervals, for the purpose of endeavouring to pave the way to a reconciliation: but his visits must be limited to the mere intercourse of the tongue—any endearment or familiarity whatever is rigidly excluded and prohibited; and were he to him if he be caught transgressing against the prescribed observances; a breach of them arms the wife with the right of employing even poison to send him into the other world. The dissolution of the marriage-vow is consummated upon the expiration of the three legal months; and if after that period the couple are inclined to resume their conjugal relations, the nuptial ceremony must be celebrated de novo. A similar course becomes requisite if a second divorcement should result in a second homage to the laws of attraction and cohesion; but after a tertian relapse, the husband cannot resume possession, excepting the wife have been married to another.

SLEEPING IN CHURCH—THE PIONY.

In the delightful days of spring, a blooming country girl, as is common enough, had carried a piony to church, as red as the rose on her cheeks. After smelling the sweet flower awhile, this flower of fair damsels closed the petals of her eyes, in common parlance, she fell fast asleep. A pretty girl looks pretty asleep; but to sleep in church—"Ay, there's the rub." Her father being a deacon, jogged her elbow. She waked for an instant, and applied the piony to her sweet nose; but it only increased her drowsiness—and, deacon's daughter as she was, she was soon again in the strong arms of Somnus—Ay, in the arms of Somnus before the whole congregation. She snored, too. How unseemingly! But she was unconscious of it. A wily wag of a snuff-taker, who sat by, opened his box, and wickedly scattered several pinches of the "tillating dust" among the petals of the piony. How could he be so ungallant! He did not stop here. He waked the sleeping beauty, whose first impulse was to apply the piony to her nose, which she did,

"ere well awaked;"

and oh, what a nasal percussion! She sneezed, and sneezed and sneezed again,

"And the high dome re-echoed to her nose."

The wag of the snuff-box was disconcerted at the mischief he had made, her father the deacon was appalled, and her lover forsook her for a whole month. Girls, never carry a piony to church.

THE SKETCH-BOOK.

THE RED MAN.

BY A MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

It was at the hour of nine, in an August evening, that a solitary horseman arrived at the Black Swan, a country inn about nine miles from the town of Leicester. He was mounted on a large fiery charger, as black as jet, and had behind him a portmanteau attached to the croup of his saddle. A black travelling cloak, which not only covered his own person but the greater part of his steed, was thrown around him. On his head he wore a broad-brimmed hat, with an uncommonly low crown. His legs were clad in top-boots, to which were attached spurs of an extraordinary length; and in his hand he carried a whip, with a thong three yards long, and a handle which might have levelled Goliath himself. On arriving at the inn, he calmly dismounted, and called upon the ostler by name. "Frank!" he said, "take my horse to the stable, rub him down thoroughly; and when he is cooled, step in and let me know." And taking hold of his portmanteau, he entered the kitchen, followed by the obsequious landlord, who had come out a minute before, on hearing of his arrival. There were several persons present, engaged in nearly the same occupation. At one side of the fire sat the village school-master—a thin pale, peak-nosed little man, with a powdered periwig, terminating behind in a long queue, and an expression of self-conceit strongly depicted upon his countenance. He was amusing himself with a pipe, from which he threw forth volumes of smoke with an air of great satisfaction. Opposite to him sat the parson of the parish—a fat, bald-headed personage, dressed in a rusty suit of black, and having his shoes adorned with immense silver buckles. Between these two characters sat the exciseman, with a pipe in one hand, and a tankard in the other. To complete the group, nothing is wanted but to mention the landlady, a plump rosy dame of thirty-five, who was seated by the schoolmaster's side, apparently listening to some sage remarks which that little gentleman was throwing out for her edification. But to return to the stranger. No sooner had he entered the kitchen, followed by the landlord, than the eyes of the company were directed upon him. His hat was so broad in the brim, his spurs were so long, his stature so great, and his face so totally hid by the collar of his immense black cloak, that he instantly attracted the attention of every person present. His voice, when he desired the master of the house to help him off with his mantle, was likewise so harsh, that they all heard it with sudden curiosity. Nor did this abate when the cloak was removed, and his hat laid aside. A tall, athletic, red-haired man, of the middle age, was then made manifest. He had on a red frock coat, a red vest, and a red neckcloth; nay, his gloves were red! What was more extraordinary, when the overalls which covered his thighs were unbuttoned, it was discovered that his small-clothes were red likewise. "All red!" ejaculated the parson almost involuntarily. "As you say, the gentleman is all red!" added the schoolmaster, with his characteristic flippancy. He was checked by a look from the landlady. His remarks, however, caught the stranger's ear, and he turned round upon him with a penetrating glance. The schoolmaster tried to smoke it off bravely. It would not do: he felt the power of that look, and was reduced to almost immediate silence. "Now, bring me your boot-jack," said the horseman. The boot-jack was brought, and the boots pulled off. To the astonishment of the company, a pair of red stockings were brought into view. The landlord shrugged his shoulders, the exciseman the same, the landlady shook her head, the parson exclaimed, "All red!" as before, and the schoolmaster would have repeated it, but he had not yet recovered from his rebuke. "Faith this is odd!" observed the host. "Rather odd," said the stranger, seating himself between the parson and the exciseman. The landlord was confounded, and did not know what to make of the matter. After sitting for a few moments, the new comer requested the host to hand him a nightcap, which he would find in his hat. He did so: it was a red worsted one; and he put it on his head. Here the exciseman broke silence, by ejaculating "Red again!" The landlady gave him an admonitory knock on the elbow: it was too late. The stranger heard his remark, and regarded him with one of those piercing glances for which his fiery eye seemed so remarkable. "All red," murmured the parson once more. "Yes, Dr. Poundtext, the gentleman, as you say, is all red," re-echoed the schoolmaster, who by this time had recovered his self-possession. He would have gone on, but the landlady gave him a fresh admonition, by tramping upon his toes; and her husband winked in token of silence. As in the case of the exciseman, the warnings came too late. "Now, landlord," said the stranger, after he had been seated a minute, "may I trouble you to get me a pipe, and a can of your best Burton? But first of all, open my portmanteau, and give me out my slippers." The host did as he was desired, and produced a pair of red slippers. Here an involuntary exclamation broke out from the whole company. It begun with the parson and was taken up by the schoolmaster, the exciseman, the landlady, and the landlord, in succession. "More red!" proceeded from every lip, with different degrees of loudness. The landlord's was the least loud, the schoolmaster's the loudest of all. "I suppose, gentlemen," said the stranger, "you were remarking upon my red slippers?" "Eh—yes! we were just saying that they were red," replied the schoolmaster. "And pray," demanded the other, as he raised the pipe to his mouth, "did you never before see a pair of red slippers?" This question staggered the respondent; he said nothing, but looked to the parson for assistance. "But you are all red," observed the latter, taking a full draught from a foaming tankard which he held in his hand. "And you are all black," said the other, as he drew the pipe from his mouth, and emitted a copious puff of tobacco smoke; "The hat that covers your numskull is black, your beard is black, your coat is black, your vest is black, your small clothes, your stockings, your shoes, all are black. In a word, Dr. Poundtext, you are!" "What am I, sir?" said the parson, bursting with rage. "Ay, what is he, sir?" rejoined the schoolmaster. "He is a blackcoat," said the stranger, with a contemptuous sneer, "and you are a pedagogue." This sentence was followed by a profound calm.

[The stranger goes to the stable; and the scene of his absence and return are very characteristic.]

The appearance of the Red Man again acted like a spell on the voices of the company. The parson was silent, and by a natural consequence his echo, the schoolmaster, was silent also: none of the others felt disposed to say any thing. The meeting was like an assemblage of quakers. * * * "Who can this man be?" "What does he want here?" "Where is he from, and whither is he bound?" Such were the inquiries which occupied every mind. Had the object of their curiosity been a brown man, a black man, or even a green man, there would have been nothing extraordinary; and he might have entered the inn and departed from it as unquestioned as before he came. But to be a Red Man! There was in this something so startling that the lookers-on were beside themselves with amazement. The first to break this strange silence was the parson. "Sir," said he, "we have been thinking that you are—" "That I am a conjurer, a French spy, a travelling packman, or something of the sort," observed the stranger. Doctor Poundtext started back on his chair, and well he might; for these words, which the Man in Red had spoken, were the very ones he himself was about to utter. "Who are you, sir?" resumed he, in manifest perturbation; "what is your name?" "My name," replied the other, "is Reid." "And where, in heaven's name, were you born?" demanded the astonished parson. "I was born on the borders of the Red Sea." Doctor Poundtext had not another word to say. The schoolmaster was equally astounded, and withdrew the pipe from his mouth: that of the exciseman dropped to the ground: the landlord groaned aloud, and his spouse held up her hands in mingled astonishment and awe. After giving them this last piece of information, the strange man arose from his seat, broke his pipe in pieces, and pitched the fragments into the fire; then throwing his long cloak carelessly over his shoulders, putting his hat upon his head, and loading himself with his boots, his whip, and his portmanteau, he desired the landlord to shew him to his bed, and left the kitchen, after smiling sarcastically to its inmates, and giving them a familiar and unceremonious nod. His disappearance was the signal for fresh alarm in the minds of those left behind. Not a word was said till the return of the innkeeper, who in a short time descended from the bed-room overhead, to which he had conducted his guest. On re-entering the kitchen, he was encountered by a volley of interrogations. The parson, the schoolmaster, the exciseman, and his own wife, questioned him over and over again. "Who was the Man in Red?—he must have seen him before—he must have heard of him—in a word, he must know something about him." The host protested "that he never beheld the stranger till that hour: it was the first time he had made his appearance at the Black Swan, and so help him God, it should be the last!" "Why don't you turn him out?" exclaimed the exciseman. "If you think you are able to do it, you are heartily welcome," replied the landlord; "for my part, I have no notion of coming into close quarters with the shank of his whip, or his great, red, sledgehammer fist." This was an irresistible argument, and the proposer of forcible ejectment said no more upon the subject. At this time the party could hear the noise of heavy footsteps above them. They were those of the Red Man, and sounded with slow and measured tread. They listened for a quarter of an hour longer, in expectation that they would cease. There was no pause: the steps continued, and seemed to indicate that the person was amusing himself by walking up and down the room. It would be impossible to describe the multiplicity of feelings which agitated the minds of the company. Fear, surprise, anger and curiosity, ruled by turns, and kept them incessantly upon the rack. There was something mysterious in the visitor who had just left them—something which they could not fathom—something unaccountable. "Who could he be?" This was the question that each put to the other, but no one could give any thing like a rational answer. Meanwhile the evening wore on apace, and though the bell of the parish church hard by sounded the tenth hour, no one seemed inclined to take the hint to depart. Even the parson heard it without regard, to such a pitch was his curiosity excited. About this time also the sky, which had hitherto been tolerably clear, began to be overclouded. Distant peals of thunder were heard; and thick sultry drops of rain pattered at intervals against the casement of the inn: every thing seemed to indicate a tempestuous evening. But the storm which threatened to rage without was unnoticed. Though the drops fell heavily; though gleams of lightning flashed by, followed by the report of distant thunder, and the winds began to hiss and whistle among the trees of the neighbouring cemetery, yet all these external signs of elementary tumult were as nothing to the deep, solemn footsteps of the Red Man. There seemed to be no end to his walking. An hour had he paced up and down the chamber without the least interval of repose, and he was still engaged in this occupation as at first. In this there was something incredibly mysterious; and the party below notwithstanding, their numbers, felt a vague and indistinguishable dread beginning to creep over them. The more they reflected on the character of the stranger, the more unnatural did it appear. The redness of his hair and complexion, and, still more, the fiery hue of his garment, struck them with astonishment. But this was little to the freezing and benumbing glance of his eye, the strange tones of his voice, and his miraculous birth on the borders of the Red Sea. There was now no longer any smoking in the kitchen. The subjects which occupied their minds were of too engrossing a nature to be treated with levity; and they drew their chairs closer, with a sort of irresistible and instinctive attraction.

While these things were going on, the bandy-legged ostler entered in manifest alarm. He came to inform his master that the stranger's horse had gone mad, and was kicking and tearing every thing around, as if he would break his manger to pieces. Here a loud neighing and rearing were heard in the stable. "Ay, there he goes," continued he, "I believe the devil is in the beast, if he is not the owner himself. Ods, if you saw his eyes: they are like!" "What are they like?" demanded the landlord. "Ay, what are they like?" exclaimed the rest, with equal impatience. "Ods, if they are like burning coals!" ejaculated the ostler, trembling from head to foot, and squeezing himself in among the others, on a chair which stood hard by. His information threw fresh alarm over the company, and they were more agitated and confused than ever. During the whole of this time the sound of walking over head never ceased for one moment. The heavy tread was unabated: there was not the least interval of repose, nor could a pendulum have been more regular in its motions. Had there been any relaxation, any pause, any increase, or diminution, or rapidity in the footsteps, they would have been endurable: but there was no such thing. The same deadening, monotonous, stupefying sound continued, like clockwork, to operate incessantly above their heads. Nor was there any abatement of the storm without; the wind blowing among the trees of the cemetery in a sepulchral moan; the rain beating against the panes of glass, with the impetuous loudness of the hail; and lightning and thunder flashing and pealing at brief intervals through the murky firmament. The noise of the elements was indeed frightful, and it was heightened by the voice of the sable steed, like that of a spirit of darkness; but the whole, as we have just hinted, was as nothing, to the deep, solemn, mysterious treading of the Red man.

(The party argue themselves into the belief that he is indeed the enemy of mankind.)

"If more proof is wanting," resumed the parson after a pause, "only look to his dress. What Christian would think of traveling about the country in red? It is a type of the hell fire from which he is sprung." "Did you observe his hair hanging down his back like a bunch of carrots?" asked the exciseman. "Such a diabolical glance in his eye!" said the schoolmaster. "Such a voice," added the landlord, "it is like the sound of a cracked chariot." "His feet are not cloven," observed the landlady. "No matter," exclaimed the landlord, "the devil when he chooses, can have as good legs as his neighbours." "Better than some of them," quoth the lady, looking peevishly at the lower limbs of her husband. Meanwhile the incessant treading continued unabated, although two long hours had passed since its commencement. There was not the slightest cessation to the sound, while out of door the storm raged with violence, and in the midst of the hideous neighing and stamping of the black horse were heard with pre-eminent loudness. At this time the fire of the kitchen began to burn low. The sparkling blaze was gone, and in its stead nothing but a dead red lustre emanated from the grate. One candle had just expired, having burned down the socket. Of the one which remained, the unanuffed wick was nearly three inches in length, black and crooked at the point, and standing like a ruined tower amid an envelopment of sickly yellow flame; while around the fire's equally decaying lustre sat the frightened cotter, narrowing their circle as its brilliancy faded away, eyeing each other like apparitions amidst the increasing gloom. At this time the clock of the steeple struck the hour of midnight, and the tread of the stranger suddenly ceased. There was a pause of some minutes—afterwards a rustling—then a noise as of something drawn along the floor of his room. In a moment thereafter his door opened; then it shut with violence, and heavy footsteps were heard trampling down the stairs. The inmates of the kitchen shook with alarm as the tread grew nearer. They expected every moment to behold the Red Man enter, and stand before them in his native character. The landlady fainted outright: the exciseman followed her example: the landlady gasped in an agony of terror; and the schoolmaster uttered a pious ejaculation, for the behoof of his soul. Dr. Poundtext was the only one who preserved any degree of composure. He managed in a trembling voice, to call out "Avant Satan! I exorcise thee from hence to the bottom of the Red Sea." "I am going as fast as I can," said the stranger, as he passed the kitchen-door on his way to the open air. His voice aroused the whole conclave from their stupor. They started up, and by a simultaneous effort rushed to the window. There they beheld the tall figure of a man, enveloped in a black cloak, walking across the yard on his way to the stable. He had on a broad brimmed, low crowned hat, top boots, with enormous spurs, and carried a gigantic whip in one hand and a portmantau in the other. He entered the stable, remained there about three minutes, and came out leading forth his fiery steed thoroughly accoutred. In the twinkling of an eye he got upon his back, waved his hand to the company, who were surveying him through the window, and, clapping spurs to his charger, galloped off furiously, with a hideous and unnatural laugh, through the midst of the storm. On going up stairs to the room which the devil had honoured with his presence, the landlord found that his infernal majesty had helped himself to every thing he could lay his hands upon, having broken into his desk and carried of twenty-five guineas of king's money, a ten pound Bank of England note, and sundry articles, such as seals, snuff-boxes, &c. Since that time he has not been seen in these quarters, and if he should, he will do well to beware of Dr. Poundtext, who is a civil magistrate as well as minister, and who instead of exorcising him to the bottom of the Red Sea, may perhaps exorcise him to the interior of Leicester goal, to await his trial before the judges of the middle land circuit.

MISCELLANY.

ON CARD PLAYING.

Gaming is no passion, it is a disease; it cannot be called avarice, for the prodigal, of all others, delights in it;—it is not ambition, for the careless and the vile resort to it;—it is not love, for it predominates over all tender affections. Mrs. Barbauld.

Philosophically speaking, no object, perhaps, can be more ridiculous than to see four rationally minded creatures sit down at table, playing with red and black pieces of pasteboard, with all the anxiety, jealousy, care, invention, subtlety, craft, cunning, and deceit which the human mind is capable of exercising under the greatest excitation.

To see men capable of exercising the highest powers of their intellectual faculties on the most sublime and most important subjects, eagerly pursue that which yields no moral or intellectual satisfaction, is truly astonishing. To see them

"Pleas'd again with toys which childhood please,"

is corroborative of the adage, that "men are only children of a larger growth."

The most refined nation becomes more apt to assume a license for vice, and that under the mask of politeness, in the following every criminal propensity to which the human heart is naturally prone. Refined vice being tolerated by general custom, spreads its contaminating influence through every rank of society. Greece and Rome are conspicuous examples of this fact: the primitive simplicity of the former was soon lost in the voluptuous manners of the Persians; and the stern virtue of the latter soon degenerated by the baleful influence of the luxurious manners of the nations tributary to the republic: the simple supper of water, herbs, and bread was gradually lost in the sumptuous entertainments of peacock's tongues, goodly Falnerian, and the balmy spices of the East.

It is an incontestable truth, that vice invariably advances as virtue recedes; and the ultimate consequences were, in the cases just alluded to, that mental and corporeal debility soon overwhelmed these nations. A licentious lethargy enervated the queen of empires: "The Niobe of nations," as Byron poetically styles Rome, became the jest of the world, the sport of fortune, and the prey of barbarians. Carrying this historic truth down to our own times, it may be inquired if we are not to look for similar effects being produced by similar causes. We surely are, and it is lamentable to perceive the havoc that vice is making in society under the sheer passport of politeness or refinement in manners; and no propensity seems gaining more ground than that of gambling.

Many of your readers are not, perhaps, aware that one of the principal amusements of young men in this town, during the winter season, is cards; and that to organize and perpetuate this system of killing-time, small parties are formed in lodging-houses, private families, &c. to meet three or four, on even five times a week. As business detains many of these unfortunate youths till nine or ten o'clock, it must necessarily be late—rather early, before they separate, and what is assumed as an amusement in the beginning of the season becomes an obstinate, irresistible, degrading propensity ere it terminates. He that loses to-night is the first to devote his time, to-morrow evening, to the sport of capricious fortune, that he may not only regain his own, but rob his neighbour of his money. I have just now in my "mind's eye" half a dozen youths whose propensity to gamble, I fear, is hourly gaining on their unstable minds. At present, it will suffice to give one example, which came under my own observation, of the fatal effects of gambling. Poor Frank—— was an amiable youth, of good education, genteel manners, and principles of the purest, strictest honour. Soon becoming acquainted with a set of young men of opposite character, he imperceptibly was led from one amusement to another, from one friend's whist-table to another's, till cards became his favourite pursuit. For some time his natural cheerfulness did not forsake him; but, at length, habit having acquired the force of a second nature, whole nights were devoted to cards, whole days from home: business was neglected, health impaired: the gay, familiar ease of the gentleman was entirely obscured in the fretful, peevish mind of the gambler. Diseased in his frame, enfeebled in his mind, impoverished in his means, in two short years poor Frank sunk into an early grave. I could easily, now, name a few others, who are rapidly following Frank's footsteps to the narrow bed.

Will it be inquired how young men could spend their winter evenings, if debarred the amusements of cards? Is it possible that a human being possessing a reasonable soul could interrogate thus? Are there no books? No literary or scientific conversation? Have you exhausted the expanded page of history, or fully discussed the situation, relation, and production of your own country? Are there no rational attractions in music, poetry, and philosophy? But, alas! I talk of subjects of taste. The perverse mind of the infatuated gambler is incapable of a lovely impression—of a refined emotion of soul; he has no relish for the graces of poetry, the beauty of painting, the melody of sound, or the sublime doctrines of philosophy. His mind is callous, vulgar, fretful, and insipid; intent on nothing save the "ruling passion." How contemptible in one's imagination a set of young sharpers become, gentlemen only in external appearance, having neither language, manners, nor knowledge sufficient for any society above the dice table.

Some few weeks ago I was spending an evening at a friend's house, when a few of these dashing "puppies of respectability" were present. Our host being a man of taste, introduced the exhibition of paintings at the Institution as the subject of conversation: on my remarking that the picture of Belinda at her toilet reflected great credit on the poet and the young artist, one of our young sparks inquired if that Belinda was not one of the Covent-garden performers! Another supposed Sir Thomas Lawrence was a physician! and a third, that Lalla Rookh was one of the Canary Isles! O tempora! O mores!

The following anecdote of the celebrated Locke is in point, respecting card players and their insipid conversations. One day three or four noblemen, the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Halifax, and others, came into Lord Ashley's, where the philosopher then resided. After some compliments, cards were introduced, before scarcely any conversation had passed between them. Mr. Locke looked on for some time while they were at play, and then, taking his pocket book, began to write with great attention. At length one of them had the curiosity to ask him what he was writing. "My lord," said he, "I am endeavouring to profit, as far as I am able, in your company; for, having waited with impatience for the honour of being in an assembly of the greatest geniuses of the age, and having at length obtained this good fortune, I thought I could not do better than write down your conversation; and, indeed, I have set down the substance of what has been said this hour or two." Mr. Locke had no occasion to read much of what he had written: those noble persons saw the ridicule, and endeavoured to improve by it, by instantly quitting their play, they entered into rational conversation; and spent the remainder of the evening in a manner suitable to their character.

Upon this plan I acted a few evenings ago; and, noting the conversation of a whist table, (for two of the parties were ladies) I procured the following incoherent dialogue:—"What's led—in politicks, ma'am!" "The Duke of Wellington is—the knave of clubs, sir; and as for Mr. Peel—deuce take his heart, he's ruffed my diamond." "Turkey, no doubt, will get the—ten of clubs I played; and as for Russia—she's taken my queen of spades." "What's trump?" "Poor Miss S. has lost her—diamond." "I cry a revoke." "A very fine day—I declare we lost the game."

That gambling is very destructive to the constitution, is evident. From watching late, it plucks the fair rose of health from the ruddy brow, and plants a pale, fretful care in the emaciated face and sunken eye. Every intemperance is its own sting, it enfeebles the body, besots the noble mind, and crases every vestige of virtue, glory and magnanimity, which once inhabited the breast. "Still it may be urged," says Mrs. Barbauld, "that gaming inspires ardent hope; but anxious hope of winning money, and agonizing fear of losing money, without the love of money, is a contrariety of sentiment that is produced by some latent defect in the brain, which neither plays nor sermons can ever remedy. Had Beverly, in the beginning of the tragedy of the Gamester, been seen with architects and masons around him, busy in laying the first stone of a castle, which was to be constructed with his intended winnings, the sight of this foundation, in every act, rising no higher in its structure, and his own snug house gradually falling down, in the mean time, for want of repairs, and, in the last scene, tumbling with pantomimick crash, so as to break his shallow pate, while all the bystanders had laughed and hoisted, this had been the surest moral for a gamester." Those who are not touched with the fate of Beverly may yet remember, that the murderous deed of Thurtle, when he imbrued his hands in a fellow mortal's blood, (poor Weare,) was the dire effects of the gaming table. Besides, this incurable, pernicious, and disgusting vice, leads its infatuated votary into a thousand other courses of immoral living. Drinking, smoking, swearing, and every licentious vice of the most consummate debauchee follow fast at the gambler's heels.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1830.

And those who are in arrears are desired to forward the amount of their bills (which may be ascertained by reference to our conditions) by mail. Notices of discontinuance should always be accompanied by the amounts due, and letters should always be post paid.

THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY-FOUR of the most respectable inhabitants of Jefferson county, being masons, have addressed an appeal to their fellow citizens, on the subject of the anti-masonick excitement. We shall lay this document before our readers next week, and in the mean time would barely observe, that it is temperately and ably written, and that with "language of truth and soberness" it carries conviction of the purity and excellence of masonry, to the mind of every reader. The Watertown Freeman, in speaking of this appeal, says: "Among the signers, it will be seen, are some of our most prominent and worthy citizens, many of whom are eminent for their piety and exemplary course of life, but who are alike subject to the exterminating warfare which is attempted to be carried on against masons and masonry. This testimony we oppose to that of the seceders, and we think it will be no difficult matter to decide on which side the balance is. Here is no equivocation—no evasion; but every accusation is met and repelled, under the sanction of more than three hundred responsible names."

The legislature of this state met at the capitol in this city on Tuesday last. The Hon. William M. Oliver was elected president pro tempore of the senate, and the Hon. Eristus Root, of Delaware was elected speaker of the assembly. Francis Granger was the anti-masonick candidate for speaker; he received twenty-five votes in caucus, and thirty in the house. The former number may safely be considered the whole strength of anti-ism in the assembly; but granting it thirty votes, still the majority against it is sixty-eight. So pitiful a minority will scarcely be able to carry on its unholy warfare with any success. It may vent its spleen, and spit its venom at the advocates of justice and toleration, but its weakness forbids the supposition that it will be able to accomplish any of its unjust and dangerous measures.

The message of the acting governor is a long and able document. Those of our readers who are immediately interested in the affairs of the state have probably ere this perused it. The governor says, that "the state owes no debt except an account of the canals," and that the population of the state has "doubled within the last twenty years," and "quintupled since 1790." The expenses of the state considerably exceed the income, "and a heavy responsibility rests upon the present, and upon the immediately succeeding legislatures," inasmuch as they must provide measure for defraying the publick expenses. His excellency advocates the bank law of the last session, and thinks the New-York banks, the only ones now opposed to it, would comply with its provisions "provided a modification of the harsh features of the revised statutes can be obtained, and the local tax, now imposed directly on the banks, be withdrawn, or placed upon the stockholders." What benefit could result from taking the tax from the stock and placing it upon the stockholders, may be a question in some minds. The idea seems to be tinged with a little with Yankeeism. It might be more difficult to get hold of the stockholders than the stock.

The Massachusetts anti-masonick convention has proved to be just of a piece with every other convocation of anti-ism. It met in Boston last week, on Wednesday, and adjourned, we believe, on Monday of this week. All that we can learn respecting it from the journals of that city, is, that it was distinguished for the same hypocrisy and affectation of "patriotism" which were the prominent characteristics of its predecessors, and for the same impotent attempts to proscribe from the rights of citizenship all who differ from its members on the subject of masonry. The following sketch of its character and proceedings, which we copy from the Boston Bulletin, will give our readers a very good idea of its intelligence, its "patriotism," and its important doings.

Another extract from the same paper relative to the same subject will be found in our masonick department: they should all have been published together had the following been received before our first side was put to press.

From the Boston Bulletin, of January 2.

GRAND CONVENTION. The doings of the Anti-Masonick aspirants after distinction, are important, of course, because certain females are to be seen gazing upon the brainless heads of the congregated worlides. On our way in, we met a man with a painful cast of countenance, attended by a set of petticoats surmounted by a tall, all over paddy, elbowing their way through a crowd of empty chairs and gazing spectators, having picked up as much knowledge as would lead to a correct conclusion on the whole subject of Masonry. On their way out, the sage husband was thus addressed by his inquisitive spouse:

She Paddy. Och, honey, and will they hang him?
He Paddy. An' who do ye mane, my darlint?
She Paddy. An' who do I mane but Morghin, sure?
He Paddy. Hang him! and sure they'll do that same—Ara! my darlint, and did you hear how they couldn't drowned him in Nihagary falls, an' so they'll hang him for sartin, the villain of all the world, they will.

After this, there was one intelligent gentleman and lady the less in Faneuil Hall.

It is agreed that no newspapers shall be supported by anti-masons but such as open their columns to a free discussion; (meaning all on one side) but a certain venerable daddy moved to have religious papers excepted. He wanted,—as we guess, though we could not make head, tail, or paws to his speech—he wanted to have religion separated from such vile trash as anti-masonry, and, as his piety is undoubted, we approve the plan—we could as soon think of uniting religion with noise, shaving, as with the business of this convention.

It would be well worth the labour to preserve the speeches of this important body—but as the heads of the principle speakers have been destitute of wit, as well as of teeth, for many a year, it is impossible for our pen to give either form or substance to their utterance. A dozen or two of dentists ought to be employed to mend the callosity of these apophyses of wisdom.

There was one man who seemed to draw a long bow, attempted to prove, by a written speech, all set down in black and white, that masonry was the cause of all the opposition to popery since time was; that a plan to assassinate his holiness was formed in a lodge—that Cromwell and James the first were masons, and that a certain king of France was induced by masonry to call his mother bad names, which, bad names he repeated, to the great annoyance of the females, who looked so piteously mortified, that the younger and more glib members made several great outcries, as is sometimes done in those parts of abolitionism called Theatre, when an offensive actor is to be removed from an inspired audience. After he was put down, the aid ones found it no easy job to contravert the reactions of the gentlemen, whose learning all came from the college library.

It being the special business of the convention to show that masonry has not lived from any time so old, as Cromwell or James the first, or the good old days of popery, it followed that the researchers of their brother were not exactly in point. He acted the part of a junior counsel, who spoils his case in spite of the skill of his senior. He argued manfully, that masons will have power, and that made them commit murders—because the old Puritans, being masons, could not reign, they killed the king—and then they settled this country, because they would have their own government, in their own way—and after that they got up a revolution, because they wanted this country to be free; a most wicked act, almost as bad as not knowing the end of the captain Morgan's travels in the United States—a most mysterious affair and wicked. If any one has a spare owl, let him be sent to sit on the president's shoulder—an assortment of grinning jackasses and muckys would not be amiss to stand about and fill up the vacant chairs.

From the Boston Bulletin, of January 4.

THE HATCHING COMPLETED. The old goose has done setting, and we suppose the egg is broken, but whether any thing better than an abortion will be found within the shell is for futurity to disclose. If there were any men of even tolerable common sense to be found among the odds and ends and parings and offals of humanity which were called to a solemn deliberation in aid of the wickedness and self-interest so notorious in the getters up of this anti-masonick excitement, they must have found it a hard task to keep their dunder-headed companions from blowing up their schemes, as they certainly did render their proceedings supremely ridiculous and disgusting.

If any honest men are among them, they deserve pity for having fallen into the hands of knaves and fools. Point to an active anti-mason, and we will show you one who, if honest, is stupid; or, if a rogue, has some object with which masonry is not connected.

If a detestable fellow has been expelled from a judicial bar and from a masonick lodge on account of his debased character and infamous conduct, he is well fitted to be a "seceder," and ought to share in the thanks of the convention for knowledge communicated.

If another can be found, who was mad, because a masonick neighbour exposed his honesty in watering his molasses, and such like patriotic acts, and undertook, in the thirst for great revenge, to destroy that neighbour's doves, by throwing to them poisoned food, which, by accident, was eaten by his own sheep, whereby many died, it will surely be confessed that he has cause to love masons and their institution, and ought to be honoured by the country for joining in the cry against them.

If another has a grand opportunity to sponge the publick, by laying bare the pretended secrets of the order, either by publishing a book, pamphlet, almanack, magazine, or newspaper, the sale whereof will fill his pockets, he surely has cause to raise the excitement as high as possible, and to perform a crusade at his own expense, in the glorious work of anti-masonry. And when such men meet together, it is wise and proper that they should call each other patriots, and pass reciprocal votes of thanks!

Nothing was more amusing, throughout the whole, than the distressed appearance of the president, when a vote was passed, thanking "seceders for the valuable information" by them communicated. He tried to play the tortoise by crawling into his skirts, and finding that would not do, he made a dip, as we supposed, to get under the table, but his head and horns stuck fast on the edge, and he appeared to writhe, as it were, with a sense of degradation, shame, and remorse. What his internal tortures were, we know not, but he could not muster a face to put the question, and quitted the chair, leaving a notable conqueror to ascertain the sense of the miserable remnant of ill-brothers, whose pockets allowed them to hang on to the last.

After this the worthy president was to be thanked in person. He made a speech. He felt painfully the sense of his situation, so different here, among people whom he knew not, from what it would be when he got home, where he would be well known. Here the treatment to him was all kindness, and he should remember it with gratitude, when he arrived where the department of order would be greeted with contempt and detestation. Unhappy, miserable fellow! Oath broken and disorderly persons can expect no better.

The patriot to whom the following paragraphs relate, was president of that congress of charlatans, the Massachusetts anti convention. Honest men must necessarily be scarce when such men are numbered among the worthies of a country.

From the Bunker Hill Advertiser.

We notice that Fliny Merriek, esq. who has been ten years a member of the Masonick Fraternity, has just discovered that there is cause for the "apprehension that in times of political excitement the Fraternity may co-operate to the injury of publick interests, and thus carry their influence into courts of justice to the injury of individuals."

Now, the truth of all this matter is, as we most sincerely believe, Col. Merriek is an ambitious little sprig of the law. He has made many efforts to raise himself above the surrounding multitude, and has improved all occasions to flatter and beseech the "dear people," to believe him something greater than they. He has been a Crawfordman and gained a glorious paper at Taunton, at his own expense—went from there to Worcester, pretended much republicanism and got dubbed a Jackson man, his appointment as aid to the Governor—then became a Jackson man, and is now (or has been) connected with a Jackson press at Worcester. In short, he is one of those straws which show how the wind blows, and has joined the outcry against Masonry that he may fill barrels with the waiting breeze and sail in the popular current to his ambitious goal.

We have no faith in such a man. We have no faith in any man who will unite with an institution for ten years, and then condemn himself by condemning that, of which he has been a member so long. Could he not have discovered his blunders when there was no excitement amongst the people? We have, to say the least, strong presumptive evidence that he does not renounce the institution simply or truly because he thinks it bad, but because a portion of the people, (who know nothing about it) think it bad. He has known as much about it these ten years as he knows now, and we do not see how, in his capacity to the brethren—saying it for granted that a man who always speaks or writes in favour of a thing, has not departed from his propensity to a society to which he belongs—landed it as high and praised its children and its usefulness as much as any other person. Verily, there "is something rotten in the State of Denmark."

Here's another renunciation. If all the delegates to the Boston convention, who were appointed contrary to their wishes, had declined, there would not have been a "corporal's guard" left.

From the Boston Bulletin, of January 2.

To the Editors of the Boston Bulletin:—Gentlemen—Having this morning, for the first time, seen my name in the "Free Press," as one of the delegates appointed by a meeting of anti-masons at Lexington, to attend a general convention at Boston on the 30th ult. I was, thank you to say, that the use of my name was without my knowledge or consent.

As I have no evidence that the masonic institution is chargeable with any violation of civil or christian duties, in our country; and as many of my most esteemed friends are of that order, I have not thought it my duty to do in promoting the excitement against it, which is already, in my opinion, too great.

JOSEPH LOCKE.
January 2, 1839.

A literary experiment has been got up in this city under the title of The Albanian. The specimen number is entirely filled with original matter of a very respectable academical character. If sufficient encouragement be offered it is proposed to issue The Albanian once a fortnight for six months; the price for which term will be one dollar. The editors are not a very courteous set of fellows—not an editor in the city, we believe, has been presented with a copy.

The editors of The Parterre have resolved not to "fiddle any longer for nothing," and have abdicated the editorial chair and imprecated a curse on their "right hand" if they ever again aspire to it. Experience is an excellent thing sometimes.

The Buffalo Journal [the establishment of which was some weeks since destroyed by fire] has appeared again much enlarged.

The Nantucket Inquirer, Catskill Recorder, Burlington Sentinel, and Johnstown Herald, have all been enlarged and much improved in appearance. The editor of the Enquirer proposes hereafter to devote a portion of his columns exclusively to the subject of education.

The New-York Truth Teller has entered upon its sixth volume. We notice much improvement in its appearance, and recommend it to the Irish as a zealous friend to their interests, and a well conducted miscellaneous journal.

Game Game. "Dr A. L. Plough, Dentist, from Holland," who has been offering his services to plough up the gums of the public, in this city and elsewhere, is denounced in some of the papers as a quack. He had diverse recommendations and certificates, which, it is asserted, are forgeries. A respectable authority calls him an impostor—to his teeth.

Dr. Plough, a year or two since practised a similar game, pretty successfully, upon the Albanians; but his method of ploughing for the needful after a while ploughed open the eyes of the public, and the doctor found it necessary to wend east when the sun was in the west. The furrows he left behind him will not soon be effaced. We have a "printer's bill" against him of about five dollars.

A melo-drama taken from Cooper's last novel, by a gentleman of this city, and entitled Mianstonimoh or the Wrept of Wish to Wish, is in preparation at the Albany Theatre.

The Theatre, Museum, and Kinckerbocker Hall were last evening brilliantly illuminated, in commemoration of the victory of New-Orleans. A military ball held at the Hall was well attended.

The editor of the Boston American Manufacturer says he is "authorised to announce that a discovery has been made, by which ONE-FIFTH of the labour in setting up types and distributing them into the cases, is saved. The plan has been submitted to a practical test, and found to be completely successful. It has also received the approval of several printers in that city. Further particulars will be given as soon as the interests of the inventor will permit."

Reciprocal Forgetfulness. Captain R—n, of this port, who had been from home about a year and a half, wrote to inform his wife that he had arrived in London, and intended to be at Barton, where he wished her to meet him on a certain day, which he named. The lady was punctual to the appointment, and so was the captain. They met at the Waterside Hotel, but, strange to say, did not know each other. At length Mrs. R—n became restless and impatient, frequently going to a window and "peering out" in the direction of the London road. This the captain observed for some time in silence, but at last ventured to ask her if she were waiting for any person. "I expect my husband," Captain R—n, will be here, every instant," answered the lady. "Blame me!" exclaimed he, "why then you are my wife; but may I be fool-headed if I knew your colour?" The result of the discovery was a friendly kiss and mutual congratulations. [Hall-gazette.]

Another Royal Poet. The Canton Register states that the emperor of China has written an ode on the capture and destruction of the fortress of Changkhur, where some rebels have for a long time resisted the authority of the government. This ode has been printed, and a copy of it sent to each of the princes and grand dignitaries of the empire, who have, as in duty bound, acknowledged the receipt of it in terms of becoming panegyric; and his Celestial Majesty has thought fit to print all their letters of acknowledgement in the Peking Gazette! The ode which has called forth this torrent of admiring criticism consists of twenty-four lines.

The National Intelligencer says the U. S. Senate have ratified two Treaties made during the last summer, at Prairie du Chien, with the Indian tribes of the Upper Mississippi, the Pottawatomies, Winnebagoes, &c. by General McNeill, Colonel Menard and Caleb Atwater, esq. Commissioners on the part of the Government, by which an extensive country, embracing the rich lead mine region, has been ceded to the United States.

The Message of the President of the United States, forwarded by the Mail Express, which left Washington at 13 o'clock on Tuesday, Dec. 8th, arrived at Mobile (Alabama) at a quarter past nine o'clock on the Saturday following. This is more than double the speed with which the express news of the Treaty of Peace travelled in 1815, and argues great improvement in the ways of the country. [National Intelligencer.]

Natural Curiosity. The editor of the Rochester Gem states, from personal knowledge, that there are two corks in Catauga county, which cross each other at right angles, and each holds its course!

When the surgeons of Tripoli take off a limb the stump is dipped into a bowl of hot pitch, which settles the bleeding without the trouble of tying up the arteries.

A thing in the shape of a newspaper, which is published at Boston, and devoted to anti-masonic billingsgate, in the course of a puff to help along a bookseller of its own kidney, who has published garbled report of the trial of Mather, gives birth to the following veracious paragraph:

"In this trial, Royal Arch Masons, who still adhered to the order, testified in Court, that their oaths bound them to exonerate a brother from difficulty, whether he was right or wrong; and in consequence of these oaths, masons were not allowed to sit on the jury to try another mason."

Now, the poor fool who was guilty of indicting the above nonsense knew very well that he was lying when he did it. We published a fair and impartial report of all the evidence elicited on the trial of Mather, relating to the obligations of masonry; and we will bet a farthing against the anti-masonic scribbler's stock of brains (though the odds of the wager be fearfully against us,) that no unprejudiced and disinterested man of common sense, in the country, has come to the stupid and unwarrantable conclusion expressed in the paragraph we have quoted. This "right and wrong" business, which has been the text of more than half the slanders heaped upon the Masonick institution, was clearly proved and explained on the trial, by renouncing masons, to relate simply and wholly, to disputes in which no public interest is involved. The chief, if not the only object of the obligation (allowing that there is such a one, merely for argument's sake) is the preservation of the public peace. Isaac W. Averill, a seceder, swore that the meaning of the obligation was, that "if he should see a Royal Arch Mason engaged with any other person in the street or elsewhere, or in any quarrel against the peace of the state, that he should immediately go to him and get him away from that particular place, not inquiring whether he was right or wrong"; and Archibald L. Daniels swore that the obligation required of him "when he saw a Royal Arch Mason in a dispute or quarrel with another person, to endeavour to get him away by giving him a particular sign, whether he be right or wrong in that quarrel." It must be evident to every one that the design of this "terrible" and "murderous" obligation is nothing more nor less than, for the sake of peace, to give one mason a controlling influence over another, who is at the moment apparently without the pale of reason. No man can rationally or honestly put any other construction upon it, and he that can be guilty of putting forth such palpable lies as we have quoted from the Boston vehicle of "murder," "treason," prescription, and billingsgate rhetoric, must be either a reckless knave, or a fool beyond the possibility of redemption. But we have already bestowed too much notice on so contemptible a source of misrepresentation, and by way of salvo present the reader with the following specimen of its profundity and knowledge of the "great men of the nation!"

"Few of the scholars and statesmen of New York can vie in talents and patriotism with Myron Holley; none surpass him. He is emphatically one of the great men of the nation!"

Myron should reward this sapient panegyrist from the "canal fund."

POETRY.

From the Spanish of Louis Babylon.

A FAREWELL TO THE YEAR.

BY MR. LOCKHART.

Hark, friends, it strikes: the year's last hour:
A solemn sound to hear:
Come, fill the cup and let us pour
Our blessings on the parting year.
The years that were, the dim, the grey,
Receive this night with choral hymn,
A sister shade as lost as they,
And soon to be as grey and dim.
Fill high: she brought us both of weal and wo,
And never lies the land to which we go.
On, on, in one unwearied round
Old Time pursues his way;
Groves bud and blossom, and the ground
Expects in peace her yellow prey:
The oak's broad leaf, the roses bloom,
Together fall, together lie:
And undistinguished in the tomb,
How'er they lived, are all that die:
Gold, beauty, knightly sword, and royal crown,
To the same sleep go shorn and withered down.
How short the rapid months appear
Since round this board we met
To welcome in the infant year,
Whose star bath now forever set!
Alas, as round this board I look,
I think on more than I behold,
For glossy curls in gladness shook
That night, that now are damp and cold,
For us no more those lovely eyes shall shine,
Peace to her slumbers! drown your tears in wine.
Thank Heaven, no Seer unblest am I,
Before the time to tell,
When moons as brief once more go by,
For whom this cup again shall swell.
The hoary mower strides apace,
Nor crops alone the ripened ear;
And we may miss the merriest face
Among us, 'gainst another year.
Whoe'er survive, be kind as we have been,
And think of friends that sleep beneath the green.
Nay, droop not; being is not breath;
'Tis fate that friends must part,
But God will bless in life, in death,
The noble soul the gentle heart.
So deeds be just and words be true,
We need not shrink from nature's rule;
The tomb, so dark to mortal-view,
Is heaven's own blessed vestibule;
And solemn, but not sad, this should flow,
Though nearer lies the land to which we go.

TIME'S FESTIVAL.

BY MRS. HALE.

Old Time once held a festival
To bless the opening year,
The feast he spread was free to all;
From lowly hut, from lordly hall,
He bade his guests appear;
But for useful thrift he has long been famed—
So lest his revel might be blamed
For luxury and art,
The only requisite he named
Was to come with a happy heart.
Who gathered to that scene of mirth
With joy's benignant brow?
Time looked for none of the mighty of earth—
The potentates of lofty birth,
Before whom nations bow—
He knew that crowns had thorns of care—
But the smiling courtier—came he there?
Or fashion's brilliant throng?
The proud, the brave, the rich, the fair?
The lords of wit and song?
When Time had scanned the number o'er
That came to share his feast,
'Tis said, he declared that never more
Would he hold his court on the old-world's shore,
Or bid a titled guest—
So we opine they would not join,
Where the happy ones were sure to shine!—
And then his brightest days,
Full on Freedom's mighty shrine
Time turned their glorious rays.
And thus Columbia was ordained
The home of the happy-hearted;
Not here the soul in seeming chained—

Not here the smile by flattery feigned—
Not here is true-love mated—
But life's bright path is free to all,
Yet should Time hold a festival
To bless the coming year—
And only bid the happy call—
Who, think you, would appear?

A BUNCH OF FORGET-ME-NOTS.

BY T. HOOD.

Forget me not! It is the cry of clay
From infancy to age, from ripe to rotten;
For who, "to dumb forgetfulness a prey,"
Would be forgotten?
Hark! the poor infant, in the age of pap,
A little Laplander on nurse's lap,
Some strange neglectful gossiping old Trot,
Meanwhile on dull Oblivion's lap she lieth,
In her shrill Baby-lish language crieth—
What?
"Forget me not!"
The school-boy writes unto the self-same tune
The yearly letter, guiltless of a blot,
"We break up on the twenty-third of June;"
And then, with Comps from Doctor Polyglott,
"P. S. Forget me not!"
When last my elder brother sailed for Quito,
My chalky foot had in a hobble got—
Why did he plant his timber toe on my toe?
To stamp on memory's most tender spot
"Forget me not."
The dying nabob, on whose shrivelled skin
The Indian "Mulliga" has left its "tawny,"
Leaving life's pilgrimage so rough and thorny,
Bindeth his kin
Two tons of sculptured marble to allot,
A small "Forget me not."
The hardy sailor parting from his wives,
Sharing amongst them all that he has got,
Keep a fond eye upon their after-lives,
And says to seventeen—"If I am shot,
Forget me not."
A past, past tense
In fact is sought for all human kind,
And hence
One common Irish wish—to leave ourselves behind!
Why, all the mob of authors that now trouble
The world with cold-pressed volumes and with hot,
They all are seeking reputation's bubble—
Hopelessly hoping, like Sir Walter Scott,
To tie in Fame's own handkerchief a double
Forget-me-knot.
Forget me not—it is the common chorus,
Swell'd by all those behind us and before us;
Each fifth of each November
Calls out "Remember;"
And even a poor man of straw will try
To live by dint of powder and of plot.
In short, it is the cry of every Guy;
"Forget me not!"

Verses suggested by a conversation respecting the astonishing rate at which steam carriages are expected to go, and the consequent mark of refinement.

AN EXQUISITE OF THE YEAR 1920, AT BREAKFAST.

Tell John to set the kettle on,
I mean to take a drive;
I only want to go to Rome,
And shall be back by five.
Tell cook to dress those humming birds
I shot in Mexico;
They've now been killed at least two days,
They'll be UN PETIT PÂTE.
I'll try that wine, too, A LA ROSE,
Just brought from Ispahan;
How could those Goths of other times
Endure that vile Champagne?
The trip I took the other day
To breakfast in the moon,
Thanks to that awkward Lord Bellair,
Has spoiled my new balloon.
For, steering through the Milky Way,
He ran against a star,
And, turning round again too soon,
Came jolt against my car.

Such fellows ought to keep below,
And never venture there;
If he's so clumsy, he should go
By no way but the Bear.

My steam is surely up by now,
Put the high pressure on;
Give me the "breath bag" for the way—
All right—hey—whizz—I'm gone.

THE SOLDIER'S TEAR.

BY T. H. BAXLEY.

Upon the hill he turned,
To take a last fond look
Of the valley and the village church,
And the cottage by the brook:
He listened to the sounds
So familiar to his ear,
And the soldier leaned upon his sword,
And wiped away a tear.
Beside the cottage porch
A girl was on her knees;
She held aloft a snowy scarf,
Which floated in the breeze;
She breathed a prayer for him,
A prayer he could not hear:
But he paused to bless her as she knelt,
And wiped away a tear.
He turned and left the spot,—
Oh! do not deem him weak;
For dauntless was the soldier's heart,
Though tears were on his cheek:
Go, watch the foremost rank,
In danger's dark career;
Be sure the hand most potent there,
Has wiped away a tear.

ECONOMY AND LUXURY COMBINED.

The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgments for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the public to his patent SOFA AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the public, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength, and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlour Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the racking. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlour fire—to boarding house keepers—to the masters of vessels—to the owners of counting rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee, now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 123 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

MASONICK RECORD.

AN APPEAL TO THE PUBLIC.

BY THE MASONICK FRATERNITY OF JEFFERSON COUNTY.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Jefferson county, and members of the masonick institution, believing that a portion of those styling themselves anti-masons are honest and sincere in their opinions, and that those opinions have been formed by the influence of false statements—deem it our duty to present the world with our testimony on the subject. Every good citizen must condemn in the strongest terms, the outrage committed against Morgan and the laws, and should use all lawful means to bring the offenders to justice. We should rejoice on all occasions, to see a proper spirit manifested, when the laws of our country are violated, or the liberty of our citizens endangered; but we cannot admit that popular excitement against any institution or public measure, is evidence that the institution is bad or the measure improper. That there are unworthy members of the masonick institution, we do not deny; but that the institution and all its virtuous members should be condemned for their misconduct, we think extremely unjust, and can never admit the principle that censures any society for the evil conduct of a few belonging to it; for in a society, small in its numbers, and the most pure that ever existed on earth, there was a Judas: and in every age since the christian era, there have been members of the christian church who have renounced their faith and solemn engagements. There have been ministers of the gospel who have become open and professed atheists; yet we trust no one can justly condemn religion on account of those apostacies. Having premised thus far, we will now speak of masonry as it has come to our knowledge, for there are no secrets relative to the principles of our institution—those principles have for a long time been published to the world. No atheist or irreligious libertine is ever knowingly admitted a member of the masonick institution—after admission, the holy scriptures are presented as a rule and guide to our faith and practice—love to God and to our fellow creatures—strict obedience to the laws of the country in which we live—universal benevolence and unbounded charity are inculcated. We are taught by symbols and otherwise, that truth is a divine attribute, and the foundation of every virtue—that the All-Seeing Eye pervades the inmost recesses of the human heart, and will reward us according to our works—that we should square our actions by the principles of morality and virtue—that we should walk uprightly in our several stations, and hold the scales of justice in equal poise—that we should limit our desires, and aspire to eminence by merit alone—that we should punctually observe our duty, and press forward in the path of virtue, ever having eternity in view—that we should avoid all dissimulation in conversation and action—that no eminence of station should make us forget that we all partake of the same nature, and share of the same hope, and that soon all distinction, but that of goodness, will cease—to regard the whole human species as one family, created by the same Almighty Parent, and that it is our duty to aid, support and protect all as their necessities require and our abilities allow—that we should distribute alms to the poor, feed the hungry, clothe the naked, and bind up the wounds of the afflicted—that we should be humble, prudent, temperate, industrious, and just to all men. Such are the precepts and duties enjoined upon masons, and we most solemnly declare that we have never taken any obligations or known of any being administered, or offered to be administered, nor have we known any doctrine inculcated contrary to the precepts above recited. We should hope that, with candid men, the foregoing declaration would be sufficient to satisfy them; but those who are so prejudiced as to make presumptions and calumnies against our order. But in order to satisfy even cavillers, and to meet every charge which is brought against us, in such a way as to leave no doubt on your minds with regard to the principles of masonry, we have judged that it would not be improper to notice some of the allegations more particularly. It is alleged, among other things, that we take upon ourselves obligations or oaths which bind us to assist a mason when in difficulty, right or wrong—to vote for a mason in preference to any other person, and what is still worse, to keep the secrets of a mason, murder and treason not excepted. We should suppose that such charges against us were sufficiently absurd in themselves to carry with them their own refutation, and that every day's observation would tend to convince you of their falsity. Some of us are templars, many more of us are royal arch masons, and we say to you that we have taken no such obligations as those above mentioned, neither have we ever heard any such administered; there are none such in masonry, and we declare to you that the allegations against us in these respects, are entirely false. The only punishment against unworthy members, known in our institution, is suspension, or expulsion; none other is sanctioned by it, and the crime of abduction and murder is as much repugnant to, and at war with, every principle and usage of our order, as it is contrary to the express command of the decalogue and the positive enactments in our statute books. In politics and religion we differ, but we agree in the immutable principles of moral virtue, which we suppose to be the basis of the masonick edifice. The unexceptionable characters of many illustrious men, who in various ages and countries, have belonged to the masonick institution, confirm the truth of these solemn declarations. Many of us have lived among you for years. You have known us in all the social and business relations of life; and though we ask nothing from your sympathy, and claim nothing from the partialities of friendship, yet we do claim that you should in candour accord to us that degree of confidence and belief which honourable men are always entitled to, and which you would bestow upon our assertions in the ordinary transactions of life.

ANTI-MASONRY IN CHURCHES.

The Baptist society, more than any other, have experienced the discord and confusion incident to the evil genius of anti-masonry. Why this society of christians should be more wrought upon and excited by the question of anti-masonry, than other christian denominations, equally pious and intelligent as themselves, presents considerations which we are not disposed to examine. But the fact appears to be so, and several of their leading elders have pushed with great zeal this excitement into their respective congregations, and many of them have already discovered, that they have introduced along with it a spirit of contention and animosity little characteristic of brotherly love, or the feelings of christian charity.

Allowing the best intentions to the actors in these scenes, yet it is an error of judgment to suppose that the interest of religion, or the peace of churches, can be promoted by turning our houses of public worship into theatres for the display of political scavengers. Religion is too pure to be mixed with the considerations of parties, and no man, unless misled by the mistaken notions of conscience, can for a moment consent to have the communion of his church disturbed by such a profane and unnatural conjunction.

The Presbyterians, numerous, influential and intelligent, have wisely discountenanced the entrance of the discordant spirit of anti-masonry into their churches.

The Methodists, equally numerous and respectable, have taken the same prudent and cautious course—and what has been the consequence? While they have heard the howling of the storm around the purlieus of their temples, within all has been peace and quietness.

Anti-masons must therefore give up all hopes of combining a religious party in support of their political schemes.

From the Lancaster (Pennsylvania) Reporter.

ANTI-MASONRY.

Some people, sensible, well-meaning bipeds too, affect to sneer at this excitement. They, short-sighted mortals, persuade themselves into a belief that it is a silly, unmeaning and unnecessary excitement, and that it must necessarily, having (in their opinions) no solid grounds to stand upon and no wholesome food to nourish and keep it alive, decay and die away. They are much mistaken who think, reason, and talk thus. They have not investigated the causes of anti-masonry; nor discovered the hideous and destructive features of masonry. Why masons and masonry are the devil. Pandora's box held nothing but the purest blessings and best gifts of man compared to the secret designs and vices of masonry. Masonry is anti-republican, anti-christian, anti-social, and anti-everything. It is a secret, dark, mysterious, murderous combination of the worst men in the world. It, in the eloquent language of the polite, learned, philosophical, brave and honourable Theophilus Parsons Fenn, is the fruitful mother of "Murder, Treason, Arson, Kidnapping and perjury." Who, then, would be a freemason? Washington, Franklin, and a host of others; the masons claim as brothers—no matter, they are all alike, and Washington and Franklin must have been Tories and traitors—or how could they have belonged to that most base institution. The masons not only murdered that pink of chivalry and honour, Captain Morgan, but they have for centuries, undiscovered until lately, 'tis true, been prowling over the country, dealing out death and destruction, treason and all other sorts of the worst kind of mischief and wickedness. The masons defaced, in their lodge room, through the Deputy Grand Master, governor Wolf, the state loan,—they burnt down nearly one half of the city of Cincinnati—they robbed the Frenchtown, Kimberton, and Reading (and almost the Harrisburg) mail,—they finally, last, though not least in their iniquitous course, killed poor Sam Patch, and raised the price of stone coal and hickory wood, to the great detriment of honest mechanics and many poor people. All this, and ten times more of evil has masonry done, and why then not put it down? To the genius, patriotism, and persevering virtue, &c. &c. of Theophilus Parsons Fenn, we are indebted for the discovery of the real character of masonry. What then should be his reward? We would suggest the propriety of congress granting him a million of dollars for his great and disinterested services, and his invaluable discovery, and when, great and illustrious man, in the course of human events, this country shall be called to lament his calamitous demise, that a monument, high as Jack's bean pole, solid as the rock of Gibraltar, and enduring as his virtues and his fame, be raised to perpetuate his glorious discovery.

THE REFLECTOR.

From the Edinburgh Review.

THE MECHANICAL AGE.

Nowhere is the deep, almost exclusive, faith we have in Mechanism, more visible than in the Politics of this time. The Philosopher of this age is not a Socrates, a Plato, a Hooker, or a Taylor, who inculcates on men the necessity and infinite worth of moral goodness, the great truth that our happiness depends on the mind which is within us; but a Smith, a De Lolme, a Bentham, who chiefly inculcate the reverse of this—that our happiness depends entirely on external circumstances; nay, that the strength and dignity of the mind within us, is itself, the creature and consequence of those.

It is no longer the moral, religious, spiritual condition of the people that is our concern, but their physical, practical, economical condition, as regulated by public laws. Thus is the body-politick more than ever worshipped and tended: but the soul-politick less than ever. Love of country, in any high or generous sense, in any other than an almost animal sense, or mere habit, has little importance attached to it in such reforms, or in the opposition shown them. Men are to be guided only by their self-interests. Good government is good balancing of these; and, except a keen eye and appetite for self-interest, requires no virtue in any quarter. To both parties it is emphatically a machine: to the discontented, a "taxing machine;" to the contented, "a machine for securing property." Its duties and its faults are not those of a father, but an active parish constable.

To speak a little pedantically, there is a science of Dynamics in man's fortune and nature, as well as of Mechanics. There is a science that treats of, and practically addresses, the primary, unmodified forces and energies of man, the mysterious springs of Love, and Fear, and Wonder, of Enthusiasm, Poetry, Religion.

Now it is certain, that in former times the wise men, the enlightened lovers of their kind, who appeared generally as Moralists, Poets, or Priests, did, without neglecting the Mechanical province, deal chiefly with the Dynamical; applying themselves chiefly to regulate, increase, and purify the inward primary powers of man, and fancying that herein lay the main difficulty, and the best service they could undertake. But a wide difference is manifest in our age. For the wise men, who now appear as Political Philosophers, deal exclusively with the Mechanical province; and occupying themselves in counting up and estimating men's motives, strive by curious checking and balancing, and other adjustments of Profit and Loss, to guide them to their advantage: while unfortunately, those same "motives," are so innumerable, and so variable in every individual, that no really useful conclusion can ever be drawn from their enumeration.

Take the Christian Religion, which, under every theory of it, in the believing or the unbelieving mind, must ever be regarded as the crowning glory, or rather the life and soul, of our whole modern culture. How did Christianity arise and spread among men? Was it by institutions and establishments and well arranged systems of mechanism? Not so; on the contrary, under all past institutions for those ends, its divine spirit has invariably been found to decay. It was spread abroad by the "preaching of the word," and flew, like hallowed fire, from heart to heart, till all were purified and illuminated by it, and its heavenly light shone, as it still shines, and as sun or star will ever shine, through the whole dark destinies of man. Here again was no mechanism; man's highest attainment was accomplished Dynamically, not Mechanically. Nay, we will venture to say that no high attainment, not any far extending movement among men, was ever accomplished otherwise. The Reformation had an invisible and ideal aim: the result was indeed to be embodied in external things; but its spirit, its worth, was internal, invisible, infinite. Our English Revolution, too, originated in religion. Men did battle, even in those days, not for purse' sake, but for conscience' sake. Nay, in our own days, it is no way different. The French Revolution itself had something higher in it than cheap bread and a habeas corpus act. Here, too, was an idea; a dynamick, not a mechanic force. It was a struggle, though a blind and at last an insane one, for the divine nature of Right, of Freedom, of Country.

Thus does man in every age vindicate, consciously or unconsciously, his celestial birthright. When we can drain the ocean into our mill-ponds, and bottle up the force of gravity, to be sold by retail, in our gas-jars; then may we hope to comprehend the infinitudes of man's soul under formulas of Profit and Loss; and rule over this too, as over a patent engine, by checks, and valves, and balances.

Nay, even with regard to government itself, can it be necessary to remind any one that Freedom, without which indeed all spiritual life is impossible, depends on infinitely more complex influences than either the extension or the curtailment of the "democratick interest?" Who is there that "taking the high priori road," shall point out what these influences are; what deep, subtle, inextricably entangled influences they have been, and may be? For man is not the creature and product of Mechanism; but, in a far truer sense, its creator and producer; it is the noble People that make the noble Government; rather than conversely. On the whole, institutions are much; but they are not all. The freest and highest spirits of the world have often been found under strange outward circumstances. The Spaniards of the sixteenth century were indisputably the noblest nation of Europe; yet they had the Inquisition and Phillip II. They have the same government at this day; and are the lowest nation. The Dutch, too, have retained their old constitution; but no Siege of Leyden, no William the Silent, not even an Egmont or De Witt, any longer appear among them. With ourselves, also, where much has changed, effect has no wise followed cause, as it should have done: two centuries ago, the Common's Speaker addressed Queen Elizabeth on bended knees, happy that the virago's foot did not even then smite him; yet the people were then governed, not by a Castlereagh, but by a Burleigh; they had their Shakspeare and Phillip Sidney, where we have our Sheridan, Knowles, and Beau Brummel.

The strong mechanical character, so visible in the spiritual pursuits and methods of this age, may be traced much farther, into the condition and prevailing disposition of our spiritual nature itself. Consider, for example, the general fashion of intellect in this era. Intellect, the power man has of knowing and believing, is now nearly synonymous with Logic, or the mere power of arranging and communicating. Its implement is not Meditation, but Argument. "Cause and effect" is almost the only category under which we look at, and work all Nature. Our first question with regard to any object is not, What is it? but, How is it? We are no longer instinctively driven to apprehend, and lay to heart, what is Good and Lovely, but rather to inquire, as onlookers, how it is produced, whence it comes, whither it goes! Our favourite philosophers have no love and no hatred; they stand among us not to do, or to create any thing, but as a sort of logick-mills to grind out the true causes and effects of all that is done and created. To the eye of a Smith, a Hume, or a Constant, all is well that works quietly. An order of Ignatius Loyola, a Presbyterianism of John Knox, a Wickliffe, or a Henry the Eighth, are simply so many mechanical phenomena, caused or causing.

THEOLOGY.

From the American Quarterly Review.

THE MOHAMEDAN RELIGION.

Every one knows, that Mohamedanism is now the religion of the Saracen countries. The Koran contains most of their doctrines; and the "Senna," a compilation of traditions, revered by the Sunnites or orthodox Moslems, contains the residue. Algazali, a celebrated doctor of Arabic theology, has summed up the religion of the Koran and Senna, in a creed first published in Europe by Dr. Poesche in his Specimen Historiæ Arabum—it is also prefixed to Dr. Ockley's History of the Saracens. It is divided into two parts, the first relating to the nature and attributes of the Supreme Being, the latter explaining the meaning involved in the sentence, "Mohammed is the Apostle of Allah." The description of the unity and power of the Creator, is nearly the same as that given in the Bible, and is, of course, unexceptionable. Our readers may form an opinion for themselves, of the second part we will give the substance. It announces several articles of faith not generally known as belonging to Mohamedanism.

Every true Moslem must believe, that Mohammed is the Apostle of Allah, sent to deliver his message to all rational beings less than angels; that he is superior to the other prophets, and that his principal companions are to be venerated next to himself, in the following order: first Abubeker, then Omar, Othman, and lastly, Ali. Mohammed is exalted far beyond his companions, so that no one must speak of the nature of Allah without adding that Mohammed is his apostle. In these words is implied, all else that the orthodox Moslem must believe, which may be reduced to the ensuing statement.

Immediately after death, every one is visited by two terrible angels, Munkir and Nakir, who reunite his soul with his body in order that he may sit upright in his grave and answer their questions as to the unity of Allah, and the mission of Mohamed. After this angelick inquisition, the deceased rests until the day of judgement, when he is awakened by the trump of Israfil. The works of each are then to be weighed in a balance, with two scales attached to a beam, equal in extent to the heaven and the earth. One of the scales is the balance of light, the other that of darkness. Books, beautiful to the sight, in which are written the good works, are cast into the first, and the unsightly volumes of evil actions into the other; weights not larger than atoms are provided to throw into the ascending scale, so that the difference between the two may be ascertained with the most exquisite accuracy, and thus every one be rewarded or punished in exact proportion to his works. After the actions are estimated, the deceased are all brought to a test which separates the virtuous from the reprobate, for there is "a real way which is a body extended over the middle of Hell, sharper than a sword, and finer than a hair." Over this all must pass, and by the eternal decree of Allah, infidels slip into the abyss, but the faithful pass over in safety. Having passed this perilous road, the believer is led to the lake of Mohamud, which is formed from the water of the river Buthar, flowing into it through two canals. It is whiter than milk, and sweeter than honey. In imitation of a divine original, the false prophet promises his disciples that whoever drinks this water shall thirst no more forever. The lake is a month's journey in breadth. Around its borders are cups innumerable. From it the believer passes into a paradise of never ending sensuality.

Such is an outline of the regular religious belief of Islam. But there are besides manifold superstitions, some supported by the Koran, and others not at variance with it. They are worthy of a few moments' attention.

There is a remote region situated amongst the mountains of Kaaf, which surround the habitable world. It is of such immense extent, that three hundred years are required to travel from some parts of it to others; it is intersected with rocks, mountains, and oceans, and is named "Ginnistan." The inhabitants are beings whom the Arabs call "Ginn," but to whom we have given the Latin name Genii, which is similar in sound, and bears the same signification. The genii hold an intermediate rank between men and angels; they pass with inconceivable rapidity through space, and have power to assume any form. They are not immortal, though many of them cannot be destroyed, except by the omnipotence of Allah, or by the most tremendous magical charms. Others are of a subordinate nature and are employed by their sovereigns in laborious works. The genii are mostly collected into empires, each commanded by a sultan. Some live by themselves haunting ruins, and other lonely places. Formerly all were in a state of rebellion against Allah; but Soleyman, or Solomon, the son of David, converted many of their nations, and broke the strength of the others in numerous conflicts, so that all are now subjected to him. Of the rebels, the Afrits are the most powerful and the worst. The evil genii are the subjects of Degial, a giantick Afrit, with wings and claws. He is kept in chains on a rock, but is destined one day to break loose and devastate the world. These beings are not confined to the infernal dominions of Eblis, but with the others live amongst the Kaaf, where is the city of Abermann, the abode of the principle of evil.

Inferiour to the genii is a race of Peris, well known to all who admire the Asiatick elegance of Lalla Rookh. No more need be said of them than that they are the same as our Fairies. Gholes are a compound of wild beasts and demons in a human form: they are powerful and ferocious, devouring indiscriminately all whom they can overcome. They invade the grave, and feast upon the half putrid bodies; and when these are wanting, seize on unwary travellers and tear them to pieces. Sometimes they veil their disgusting propensities under the appearance of civilization, and mingle with the world; they even intermarry with mankind. Vampyres are well known to us as the bodies of the dead, impelled by a dreadful and irresistible necessity to preserve an accursed existence by sucking the life blood of others, who, in their turn, are doomed after death to the same state of being.

That which is most appalling in the Saracen superstitions is, the earthly form and human attributes assigned to the evil genii and gholes. The Arab fears no indistinct and visionary being, whilst he hurries home through deserted places; for he knows that it is not more certain that Allah commissioned Mohamed to preach the true faith, than that the air and earth are alive with malignant demons, whose bodily power is sometimes permitted to extend even to the persons of believers. Unaccountable dread sometimes falls at night upon those who, in Christian countries, have every assurance of a superintending Providence; but how much more must this be overpowering to one who is unable to see a distant shadow through the twilight, and feel certain that it is not cast from the iron wing of some Afrit, abroad on the work of destruction. When the Arab mariners are driven by the storm amongst the rocks and sand bars through which they grope their way from port to port, shipwreck is not the worst they have to fear. To be swallowed in the ocean would be preferable to being cast by any chance on an island, such as Poelseton, where they would be received by the inhabitants, who are devils, howling night and day. The power of the evil genii may inflict something worse than death upon their victims. Instead of sending him out of their reach, which extends not beyond the grave, they may doom him to linger an enchanted existence in a brutal form, or in a state similar to that of the king of the Black Isles, mentioned in one of the Arabian tales, who was half changed into black marble, and was beaten every day by the tormenting enchantress who metamorphosed him. The superstitious terrors of the Saracen are probably less powerful than when the Arabian Nights were composed; for then the Turks were not so phlegmatick, nor the Persians so skeptical as now. But we are, notwithstanding, inclined to think that, especially in Turkey and Arabia, the marvels related in the Arabian Nights, do not fall far short of the belief of the people.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

ANECDOTES OF RUSSIA.

I was in Moscow in 1828, and attended the religious observance of the anniversary of the retreat of the French army from that city. The snow had fallen, and the prospect of a rigid winter was everywhere conspicuous; sledges had superseded the droskas, and the whole view, comprising the Sparrow Hills, looked cheerless and uncomfortable. At ten o'clock in the morning, the inhabitants of the city assembled near the Holy Gate of the Kremlin; and here I awaited the procession, I may say, with considerable coolness. It was useless to pass the Gate; as every one so doing, to enter the Kremlin, must be uncovered. This act of veneration is traced by some as a commemoration of the miraculous delivery of the Kremlin from an invasion of the Tartars; others date the custom from the cessation of the last plague. The procession began about half-past ten: it consisted of all the clergy of Moscow, and certainly was accompanied by almost all the lower class of the inhabitants. The riches of the churches were exhibited, and the dresses or decorations of the more advanced divines, were the most splendid I ever beheld; the lower class, comprising the curates, &c. walked uncovered, their long, flowing hair, hanging over their shoulders; the banners of the churches, the crucifix, the soldiers, and the populace, making a sight novel and imposing. This is a grand holiday for the Russians; the saints have an extra quantity of candles presented, and the image over the gate, (whose miraculous power, when Bonaparte attempted to destroy the Kremlin, interposed in so signal a manner, that the glass which covered the saint was unbroken,) has more prostrations on that day than all the year put together. The women were all in their best attire, and some, in spite of the little eyes, and those far apart, looked attractive and pretty. The Tartar, the Persian, the French, German, English, and Russian nations, mingled in the ceremony, and accompanied the procession round the walls of the Kremlin. It was a sight, mingled with the recollection of that famous retreat, that amply repaid the uneasy sensations of cold and fatigue.

All travellers have ridiculed the superstitions of the Russians, and not without reason.

A stranger, in passing through the Gostonio-Dwn, will be struck by the appearance of the numerous merchants, and shopkeepers of the same calling, close together. In this respect, Moscow resembles Constantinople in its bazaars; and whoever has visited these two cities will be struck by the resemblance. Thus the silversmiths are together; the shoe, or paint bazaar, quite separate; and to each trade, from the sharp-sighted money changer to the cheating vender of furs, a separate place is allotted. But of all thriving trades, god-making is one of the best. Shops, by hundreds, are filled with ready-made divinities; but in entering this shop, the Russian will select the one belonging to the master of the house, to which he makes his bow and his cross.

It requires some management to refrain from laughing at the absurd prostrations and crossings of all the fools of the town, at every daub at which a candle can be burnt. It is really difficult sometimes to pass the miraculous image before mentioned, over the gate of the Kremlin, without stumbling over some old, besotted, bigoted woman, who, in spite of dirt and droskas, knocks her head, with unremitted sanctity, for an hour against the pavement. Often have I seen a long-bearded hypocrite offering some foolish girl a relic to kiss; while the poor deluded creature imagined the pious offering of a few copecs would insure the safety of a lover or parent from the heretic Turk. Every droska-driver crosses himself when he passes one of these public gods; and the merchant, before he drives himself to cheat you, most piously makes the sign of the cross. But this species of adoration is, of course, better seen in church. Happy he who can get near an altar, or the carpet before it; this is sure salvation, and heads and tales make the most ridiculous motions. Old and young, men and women, greybeards and children, all kotow it to admiration. From these frequent prostrations, hasty travellers would conclude the Russian is sincere in his devotions. I know a young Englishman who had his pockets picked in the Casan Church in Petersburg, and the theft was committed by one who practised prostrations most earnestly. At the door of almost all Russian churches will be found a vender of candles, by which, to pious saints, they make concessions. The candle merchant invariably crosses himself during the whole of the ceremony, excepting when he pockets the money for these holy offerings. A Russian's prayers seem to consist in two words. "Gospodi Pomelui!"—"The Lord have mercy upon us!" and in the chapel at Galitzin's Hospital, near Moscow, this is sung with the most admirable effect. I do not remember in all my life to have heard voices that had such an effect upon me as in the above church. No music is allowed; and the singers are so well selected, that they generally sing in the four or five best notes of their voices, the base being deep indeed, and the higher notes sung by boys. Every traveller has remarked this in the Emperor's chapel at Petersburg; but the preference is given, by good judges, in favor of Galitzin's Hospital.

CAPSIZING A SAILOR.

As an honest seaman, who had just come into port, was taking a stroll in the country, he saw a bull dashing furiously along the road, directly towards him, and, according to the custom of the animal, when under full speed, with his tail straight out behind him. "Bull ahoy!" roared Jack, making a speaking trumpet of his hand, "ease off your spanker sheet, there, you lubberly son of a cow, or you'll be afool of me." The bull paid no attention to the warning of the sailor, and the next moment Jack was rolling in the dirt. "There, d—n your eyes!" said the enraged tar, gathering himself up, "I told you, you would run afool of me!" [N. Y. Constellation.]

None know the full extent of present hate, but those who have achieved that which will engage the highest meed of future admiration. [Lanes.]

THE GERMAN'S STORY.

AN HALLUCINATION OF THE MIND.

I was sitting one evening, just before twilight, with my back against the wall, in a recess of my withdrawing room, in which there was a large window. I leaned my arm on a table, and was meditating, with no continuous train of thought, but, certainly, without the least somnolency; as I am not subject to it in the afternoon, and had taken strong coffee after a light dinner. A strange sensation came over me, identifying the present moment with one which had been. "Just so I have felt—all this I have acted and suffered before." Thus I thought, or rather, of this I was conscious. It was not that I accurately recognized any particular combination of existing images or sensations, as the doubles of those I had perceived at a previous point of time: but the strange consciousness was entire and irresistible, and was accompanied with a peculiar physical effect, not unlike the incipient terror of those who are affected by the dread of supernatural appearances. As my dog looked up sleepily in my face, this singular hallucination grew more vivid. A lady, who was in the room, made some remark as she quitted it. I heard only as it seemed to me, a passing strain of music in the cadence of her sweet tones; and, as I looked upward, I felt that I knew all that was to follow.

But Beatrice stood before me, with her full yet floating and angelic form, her bright and laughing eyes, and her luxuriant hair, with its clusters carelessly yet classically confined in beautiful subordination; and she smiled as she was wont, when not to believe the language of her expression, would have been disbelief in the existence of angelic intelligences. So I looked at her. I could not love her more than I had done, or did; for love of her then occupied my soul, and was like the Hebrew tense, supposed to shadow forth the divine origin of that language—past, present and to come. The modifications of time had nothing to do with my feelings, to which Love, undivided, was the measure of duration as well as of space, matter, and sentence. Beatrice stood before me. "So," said she, "you are in a brown study again!"

"Our ideas will wander, dear Beatrice, at certain times, when we are not asleep, and cannot safely swear that we are awake. But now I am wide awake; and now I think of but one object."

"That is because you cannot help it. It is before you and compels you to talk to it."

"Sit down by me, and do not be so mischievous. Why, you are almost in bridal apparel!"

"I am practising for the day after to-morrow. Do you think you will be ashamed of me?"

We sat together in a recess, a window which admitted a prospect of the beautiful twilight scene; and the softened glory yet lingering in the west, mellowed but not yet all spiritual, as it irradiated her form and features, showed me the most delightful vision which prophet had ever seen, or poet pretended to behold. And it was no phantasm; for this exquisite image breathed and lived and panted responsively to the quick and full pulsation of my own heart: and as I looked down in her eyes, where the light of the soul illuminated each mysterious sun of expression, which shed its effulgence over the sweetly moulded world of her features, I seemed gazing into wells of unfathomable thought, and holiness and love. He who could have believed that truth did not lie at the bottom, would never have been healed at the pool of Bethesda. But what was I to believe? I only felt, strong as the consciousness of my own existence, that we loved. I saw my own miniature in each of those wondrous orbs; and did they not open into her heart?

"Beatrice!"—I murmured.

"Hierome!"—she whispered.

"Why, is not to-morrow, the day after to-morrow?"

"Because, my friend, the almanack-makers will not have it so. The day after to-morrow will come soon enough. (And she sighed.)

"But not too soon, Beatrice?"

"Oh no!—It is past seven o'clock, is it not?"

(What a strange question!)

"I should think so; for the sun set some minutes ago."

"Well, Hierome, when the everlasting sun measures the days and nights, and the heart measures time by its own calendar, I wonder why they make almanacks, and watches. It seems to me as absurd as astrology. Did you ever believe in astrology?"

"Believe!—I believe nothing at this moment, but that I am, and you are;—and that I love you as my better existence. But, last night, I was gazing on the stars, and I will censure no one hereafter for having faith in their ordained connexion with the destinies of men—provided the proselyte is not honestly in love, and an accepted lover. If he cannot then defy augury, he ought to be discharged, by his mistress."

"I incline to the same opinion," said Beatrice. If he is frightened by looking at the quiet stars, a melon rind with a candle in it would be certain death to him."

"But you shall hear about my astronomical observations, nevertheless, dear Beatrice. I looked forth on the eternal, silent and mysterious heavens. Star after star, as it hung in the intensely blue abyss, arrested my glance, and then it wandered to another and yet another. More millions of those extinguished lamps were raying out their influence, than there have been individuals to be governed by them, among living men and the generations that have been on this planet, since the morning stars sang together. I looked upon the milky way; and explored, with untaught eyes, that star-studded pavement for the footsteps of Omnipotence. All was vague and undefined in the mirror that gave to my soul its images; or else my soul drank in only the lessons of Eternity and infinite Power, which the meanest peasant can read in that book of God. But presently my attention was fixed upon two pellucid and sparkling orbs, distinctly shining near each other. Their spheres were as uniformly brilliant as the focal radiant eye of the diamond; save that their lustre seemed more liquid, and that they appeared to oscillate in the ocean of immensity beyond our atmosphere, sprinkling or shooting forth portions of their own pure glory; and as they vibrated, they still seemed seeking to approach each other."

"Did you hold your fingers between your eyes?" said Beatrice, "because—"

"Pshaw!" said I, rather angrily—"I know it is all folly; but I did not hold my finger between my eyes. And to what do you think I likened those two beautiful stars?"

"Perhaps to Aretine's two eyes."

"No!" said I, still more vexed, "If I had wished to see any body's two eyes in those stars, you might account for it. But I will tell you all my vision. I likened them unto ourselves; and in the very sanctuary of my heart I offered up to them my orisons, and adopted them as the controllers of our destiny. The filmy drapery which had floated round them, was withdrawn. In a certain space in heaven, they were alone; and therein they shone and radiated, and sometimes seemed almost to kiss each other. Whether it was a mere delusion of the sight or the imagination, or that some wandering meteor mocked me—it did seem that I saw a sphere of morbid aspect drop rapidly between those two goodly stars; and I was startled through the very marrow of my frame, with the rapidity of an electric shock, and with a cold sensation, which I felt through every pore. You need not laugh, Beatrice. The yellow star fell. Some one then spoke to me, about I know not what; but when I looked again, a silvery curtain had been drawn over that portion of the firmament; and through it I only saw, as I thought, the heaven-rejected and sickly hues of that strange, interloping light. Now this made me melancholy, until I fell asleep: and then in my dreams I saw this unholy orb, moving about, like an ignis fatuus in a churchyard. At last I thought I was in our own cathedral, and that you were with me; and that the priest stood in the chancel with an open book; and that then this accursed and persecuting globe came, and hung right over the altar, whirling round and round its dull, tainted and abominable fires, till I grew sick!"

"I do not wonder at it."

"But, Beatrice, I must tell you almost every thing. Have compassion on my dreams; though they are made, like those of other men, of incondite stuff—the leavings of reason."

"Strange stuff they are," said Beatrice, "and not worth remembering. You may look into the fire, or into the water, or among the stars, until you can see what you please. And if you look upon the water or stars very long, you may see what does not please you. This was your case. I had much rather look at an honest wood-fire, or a grate full of good coals. There you may form Sacens, Knights, and whatever you like, and invest them with all the glorious poetry of obscurity; and then, like Circe, metamorphose them into what you will; and you do not feel dizzy or light-headed afterwards. But where do you think Frederick can be?"

Frederick was my friend, O Nemesis! and the cousin of my best beloved. I do not know why a convulsive shudder should have passed through my frame, when this simple question was addressed to me by Beatrice. He had dined with us, and was to return with her that evening to her father's house, a couple of leagues distant.

"I dare say he is merry enough, with the merrier party in the saloon."

"Do you know," said Beatrice, "I have thought it would be more delightful to give my father our intended present, now, than after—after—"

"After he has given you away, dear Beatrice. Do as you please about it."

"Oh! I will not thank you now," said she. And she kissed my cheek. To be sure, I would have given her every thing, save the fee-simple of my soul, if she had then asked for it. I held a bond for a very large amount, which had been given by her father to mine, as security for which nearly all the property of the debtor was pledged. A release, drawn up with all due formalities, had been prepared and executed; and we had agreed to present it to her father, on the day of our wedding. It was in an escritoire on the table beside me, and I drew it out and gave it to her. She placed the parchment in her bosom; and, pressing her hand upon it, said, "It is all yours, nevertheless."

"Ce qui est a toi est a moi."

"Ce qui est a moi est a nous. But there comes Frederick, at last," said Beatrice, gently withdrawing from me.

Another chill passed over me; and now it struck me more emphatically than before, that it was strange how the name of her best friend should have the effect of one of those charmed words, which being uttered will cause paralysis, fever, and other sudden diseases, in certain men, or the animals which are their property. I looked casually forward, in vacancy of thought, and my glance fell on a large mirror of singular perfection, which, in the waning light, seemed to reflect objects with more distinctness than that in which the original images were directly presented to the eye. The picture of Frederick passed over it; and its polished surface became immediately overclouded with a rusty incrustation, through which, smoking with pestilential lustre, I thought I saw the dingy yellow star of my vision. Ashamed of such weakness, I have expressed my vexation in spoken words.

"I am getting to be a mere old woman. Frederick, I hope you have committed no deadly sin! They say that a true mirror is spoiled, when it has reflected the image of a contaminated person; and just now, I thought that the large looking glass was clouded when you passed it. And so it is still, if I see well."

"You do; and the glass looks as if the servants had been keeping holiday," said Frederick, who stood looking earnestly at me. It afterwards occurred to me that his colour changed, and that a tremour passed over him.

"He is getting so superstitious," said Beatrice, "that I am almost afraid of him. I almost believe that he keeps company with ghosts, and that some of his friends may come to see me, without knocking."

"MARRIAGE will lay them," said Frederick.

"I hope so!" said Beatrice.

"I know it will," said I. But, while I said it, I felt as if two separate processes of thought were going on in my brain, with inadequate machinery; and I wondered how I did know that I knew it!

"The coach is waiting," said Frederick: "it is later than I had supposed; and I shall take the liberty of doing now what I shall never have the right to do again; of parting you two."

"I must go then," said Beatrice, gliding her hand into mine, while a quick look of singular intelligence passed between her and her cousin.

"No! by the God that made and redeemed me!" I exclaimed, starting forward furiously—"not this time! All this has been once before; and, oh! there was a horrible sequel of shameless fraud and perjury and infamy—and of idiocy, credulity, and forgiveness! But not again! Every syllable of all this I have heard before. Every sensation I have felt before. Every image, even to the twirling of that wretch's half-gnawed glove, I have seen before! But whether the eternal river of time has rolled backward, or I have slept and dreamed through a long interval of pain and joy, or nature is to stand still while this drama is played over again, for my indemnity and your confusion—now, miserable swindlers, you shall not go! Traitor, I spit upon you! Liar and coward, take this token of my friendship!"

And I aimed a blow at the vanishing shadow, as my own wife, my dear Aretine, entered with a candle, which she had left the room to seek. She could not have been absent two minutes; and I had not stirred from my position.

THE CENSOR.

From the Journal of Health.

BEWARE OF STRONG WATERS.

We all declaim loudly against drunkenness, and yet how few of us are exempt from the charge of intemperance in the use of strong waters. Pity is mingled with our contempt for the sot and the wine bibber—we are sensibly alive to the evils which they bring upon themselves, their families, and friends, in their own lost health and credit—begged children and heart-broken wives. But we do not watch with the same scrutinizing eye those habits of indulgence in daily potations, by which the nerves and senses are irregularly excited—digestion impaired—the mind rendered either moody and sad, or capricious, and indiscreetly gay. "My son," methinks we hear a father gravely say, whilst taking his glass of wine bitters in the morning; "My son! I will no longer allow of such doings as those of last night:—such boisterous mirth and drunken revelry shall not be repeated again under my roof." The admonition is acknowledged by the son in the sober imitation of his parent, and smacking his lips after the bitters or the julep has been swallowed, he promises amendment. How the pledge is redeemed we may easily conceive, as we would of a promise given by a man, bent on suicide, to abstain from taking arsenic, who the next hour swallows laudanum. "Poor fellow! he is burnt out at last!" exclaims an inflated porter drinker—adverting to an old acquaintance recently dead from the excessive use of distilled spirits, and not aware that his own bluff visage, blue skin, and wheezing cough announce a lingering disease, if not an untimely end. And yet he would not get tipsy for the world—he has too great a regard for his credit in the money market. Nobody, it is true, ever saw him drunk; but every member of his household knows full well that, however active and bustling he is in the morning, and until the hour of dinner, he will be found by evening passably boozy; that is, with a certain muddiness of thought and thickness of speech—happy effects of his innocent malt liquors and the company-bearing pipe.

Mr. — carries conviction to the minds of all his hearers, by his powerful arguments and pathetic appeals against the evils of intemperance, so unhappily fostered by distilleries at home, and importations of liquor from abroad. Does no friend at table observe that the speaker has borrowed most of his inspiration from the Madeira, which he has been drinking for the last two hours?

A physician cautions his hypochondriacal patient against the use of strong drinks, except a little brandy and water at dinner. Now this strong water to-day must be a little stronger to-morrow, else the patient finds it insipid; and by the rule of increase he soon becomes a regular tippler; but then, he has the consolation of knowing that he proceeded in the matter by advice. Some invalids having been at first persuaded, and eventually satisfied themselves, that they must constantly take physick, determine on as agreeable a mixture as possible. They select one kind of root, as a bitter, to give them strength; another to correct heartburn—a third to obviate flatulence; and then mix them all up in a bottle of brandy, or whiskey, or gin. The raw liquor they abominate; and they know that it would aggravate their malady: indeed, they prudently determined to drink nothing but water. The tincture, for so the contents of the bottle is called, is merely taken medically, before breakfast and dinner, in order to improve their appetite and help digestion. The effect of this practice is soon discovered in the extreme difficulty of such persons, under better advice, leaving off their medicine, and returning once more to simple nature, whose distillation, as seen in the waters of rivers and springs, is the only drink for the purposes of true invigoration and permanent cheerfulness.

In all our exertions to promote the cause of temperance, we continually invoke the assistance of the fairer portion of creation. The temperament of females, their natural cheerfulness and animated piety, all render them independent of the excitement produced by the intoxicating draught—even did the usages of society allow them in this particular the same right of choosing as the lords of creation. But we fear that, in a spirit of sociability, and deference in these latter, they yield more than always becomes them, or is consistent with that discreet reserve and subdued cheerfulness, which is at once their highest charm, and surest protection. If they take a glass of champagne, at a formal dinner, it is, of course, merely that they may afterwards laugh, with a friend, at the light-headedness which it leaves behind it; if porter be used by them daily for a certain period, it is because as invalids, or mothers, they are counselled (not always by physicians) to drink it—even though it gives rise to drowsiness and a deep flush on the cheek, in place of the roseate or love's proper hue. But in the evening circle, they yield a more dangerous compliance with men's love of drink, when they allow the sweet luscious cordial to be handed to them, whilst the stronger nerves of the others are stimulated by wine. They do but sip, it is true; but renewed solicitations from their very kind friends induce them, however loath, to sip again; and then, to keep some fopling in countenance or good humour, they must sip once more, until, as in all other cases where the line of propriety is infringed, they find they have gone too far, and are sufferers for their complaisance. Does habit after a while reconcile them to the practice? or do they finally acquire a relish for these dangerous sweets? We dare not, of our own knowledge, reply affirmatively to either of these questions; but we are not without fears of their having some foundation in fact. We may perchance be interrupted here by some fashionable reader exclaiming, where can the man have obtained materials for this sketch?—surely never in the first circles. But with the most respectful deference to our critic, we beg leave to say that we write for society at large, not for this or that circle, or individual interest.

But the largest class of strong waters still remains unnoticed, viz. the infusion of Imperial, and Hyson, and Gunpowder; or the decoction of the Arabian berry, as, by a periphrase, coffee is sometimes called. It is not for us to censure harmless enjoyments, or sternly reprobate the pleasures of the tea-table, when the drinks above mentioned circulate, giving to their votaries renewed animation and conversational powers. But, as guardians of health, we are bound to warn the feeble, the nervous, the dyspeptic, the hypochondriacal, the gouty, whose hearts beat as though they would burst from their bases on the slightest noise or unexpected remark, the fretful and capricious in temper, the delicate student, or man of letters,—that strong tea or coffee are injurious, and cannot be tolerated by them with any regard to their bodily comfort and mental tranquility. Let the trembling hypochondriac, in a state of premature old age, quote Johnson as he will, in favour of tea; or the irascible dyspeptic adduce Voltaire in proof of the good effects of coffee; we have had too many examples of the pernicious operation of beverages on the delicate frame of an invalid, and of the constitutionally infirm, to be swayed by the occasional escape of a few celebrated literati. But even these are not in point. Who, (we speak in reference purely to corporeal sensation,) would be willing to follow the example of Johnson in his copious potations of tea; and then endure, like him, the direst fantasies of a mind perpetually struggling against the darkest and most painful melancholy; or would desire to spend life in a continued fever, a walking skeleton, the "witty, profligate, and thin,"—like Voltaire,—even for the supreme bliss of sipping coffee through a long series of years.

CHARACTER.

COLONEL M'LANE.

This venerable and distinguished soldier of the revolution, after having reached the patriarchal age of eighty-three, closed his earthly pilgrimage at Wilmington, Delaware, a short time since.

Colonel M'Lane was distinguished for daring personal courage, and for his unremitting activity as a partisan officer. He was long attached to Lee's famous legion of horse, which, throughout the war, was the terror of the British. An instance of his personal prowess, related to us by himself, we may be permitted to give.

While the British occupied Philadelphia colonel M'Lane was constantly scouring the adjacent country, particularly the upper part of Philadelphia, Bucks, and Montgomery counties—seizing every opportunity to cut off the scouting parties of the enemy, to intercept their supplies of provisions, and to take advantage of every opening which offered for striking a sudden blow. In this capacity, he rendered many important services to the army, and caused great alarm to the British; and though they frequently attempted to surprise and take him, yet such was his constant watchfulness, that none of their attempts succeeded. Having concerted with captain Craig (now living, we believe, near Belvidere, N. J.) the plan of an attack upon a small detachment of the enemy, they agreed to rendezvous at a house near Shoemaker town, eight miles from Philadelphia, on the Willow Grove turnpike. Colonel M'Lane, having ordered his little band of troopers to follow at some distance, commanded two of them to precede the main body, but also to keep in his rear; and if they discovered an enemy to ride up to his side and inform him of it without speaking aloud. While leisurely approaching the place of rendezvous, in this order, in the early gray of the morning, the two men directly in his rear, forgetting their orders, suddenly called out, "Colonel, the British!" faced about, and putting spurs to their horses, were soon out of sight. The colonel, looking around, discovered that he was in the centre of a powerful ambuscade, into which the enemy had silently allowed him to pass, without his observing them. They lined both sides of the road, and had been stationed there to pick up any straggling party of the Americans that might chance to pass. Immediately on finding they were discovered, a file of soldiers rose from the side of the highway, and fired at the colonel, but without effect—and as he put spurs to his horse, and mounted the road side into the woods, the other part of the detachment also fired. The colonel miraculously escaped: but a shot striking his horse upon the flank, he dashed through the woods, and in a few minutes reached a parallel road upon the opposite side of the forest. Being familiar with the country, he feared to turn to the left, as that course led to the city, and he might be intercepted by another ambuscade. Turning, therefore, to the right, his frightened horse carried him swiftly beyond the reach of those who fired upon him. All at once, however, on emerging from a piece of woods, he observed several British troopers stationed near the road, and side directly in sight ahead, a farm house, around which he observed a whole troop of the enemy's cavalry drawn up. He dashed by the troopers near him, without being molested, they believing he was on his way to the main body to surrender himself. The farm house was situated at the intersection of two roads, presenting but few avenues by which he could escape. Nothing daunted by the formidable array before him, he galloped up to the cross roads; on reaching which he spurred his active horse, turned suddenly to the right, and was soon fairly out of the reach of their pistols, though as he turned, he heard them call loudly, surrender or die. A dozen were instantly in pursuit; but, in a short time, they all gave up the chase, except two. Colonel M'Lane's horse, scared by the first wound he had ever received, and being a chosen animal, kept ahead for several miles, while his two pursuers followed with unwearied eagerness.

The pursuit at length waxed so hot that, as the colonel's horse stepped out of a small brook which crossed the road, his pursuers entered at the opposite margin. In ascending a little hill the horses of the three were greatly exhausted, so much that neither could be urged faster than a walk. Occasionally, as one of the troopers pursued on a little in advance of his companion, the colonel slackened his pace, anxious to be attacked by one of the two—but no sooner was his willingness discovered, than the other fell back to his station. They at length approached so near that a conversation took place between them: the troopers calling out—"Surrender, you damned rebel, or we'll cut you to pieces." Suddenly, one of them rode up on the right side of the colonel, and without drawing his sword, laid hold of his collar. The latter, to use his own words "had pistols which he knew he could depend upon." Drawing one from the holster, he placed it to the heart of his antagonist, fired, and tumbled him dead on the ground. Instantly the other came up on his left, with sword drawn, and also seized him by the collar of his coat. A fierce and deadly struggle here ensued; in the course of which colonel M'Lane was desperately wounded in the back of his left hand, cutting asunder the veins and tendons of that member. Seizing a favourable opportunity, he drew his other pistol, and with a steadiness of purpose which appeared even in his recital of the incident, placed it directly between the eyes of his adversary, pulled the trigger, and scattered his brains on every side of the road. Fearing that others were in pursuit, he abandoned his horse in the highway; and apprehensive, from his extreme weakness, that he might die from loss of blood, he crawled into an adjacent mill pond, entirely naked, and at length succeeded in stopping the profuse flow of blood, occasioned by his wound. We have seen a painting of this desperate encounter, very accurately representing the contest. It used to be common in our auction rooms, but of late years has become scarce. It should be revived, painted on a large scale, and be hung up in the house of every man who venerates the memory of the departed patriots of this country.

THE GATHERER.

THE YOUNG SWISS AND PLUTARCH.

An honest Swiss, of the Pays de Vaud, having determined to send his son to Paris, made a present of a fine Plutarch, with large margins and handsomely bound, at the time of their parting. The father earnestly recommended to his son to read the lives of the great men of antiquity. "Make this book (said he) your principle study: begin your morning exercises with reflections on the conduct of the illustrious men whose history it contains; you will thus learn to imitate them. I assure you my son, it will be greatly to your advantage to continue this reading regularly."

The young man readily promised to read his Plutarch which his father delivered to him, but the first thing he did was to lock it up in his trunk.

Two months soon passed away in Paris. The young man wrote to his father, that notwithstanding his economy, he wanted money. "Read Plutarch was the old man's answer. The son wrote a second time, assuring him that he had read Plu-tarch from the beginning to the end. "No my son," replied the father, "you have not read it." In another letter he desired him to remember the voluntary poverty of Aristides; imitate Scipio as much as you can. "I assure you my son, you will find every thing you want in Plutarch. Read him, and you will soon find how to live well, and to live happy."

At the end of six months, the father came to Paris, and met the young man in his lodgings. "O father! how happy am I to see you. You are come very opportunely; I am in debt to every body, and daily beset with creditors."

"Have you read through Plutarch?"

"O yes; I have read him from beginning to end, and have made reflections as I went along, according to your desire."

"Let us see young man; show me the book."

The son, somewhat disconcerted, brought the volume out of the bottom of the trunk.

"You surely scarcely have touched it (said the father); it appears as new as it was when I gave it to you; it has lost nothing of its original lustre in your hands."

The young man observed he had taken great care of it, and it was not fair to conclude that he had not read it regularly, because he had been fortunate enough to preserve it in the best condition.

"We shall soon see what is the real state of the case," said the father; "I wrote a note on the life of Aristides. He is my hero; and the note ought to have been very useful to you, it was made opposite to that remarkable trait where he promotes his own ostracism (a rigorous measure sometimes necessary in a republic,) by writing his name on the shell of an oyster which a peasant who did not know him, presented to him."

I have always admired the sacrifice made by the just man who opposed himself so earnestly to public dissipation and extravagance." Plutarch was opened at the story of the shell, and the note appeared in the margin. The commentary was of a very singular kind; it was a bill, payable to the bearer, for two hundred louis d'ors, written on the margin, and signed by the old gentleman.

In this manner he had proposed to reward his son for reading the lives of the great men of antiquity. The father cut it off, and put it in his pocket, saying, "I am very sorry that you have not taken notice of the glossary I thought necessary to the text; I did not think it would have been so much despised."

RECEPTION OF AMBASSADORS IN TURKEY.

The insolence and contempt with which this haughty nation has been permitted to treat foreigners are strongly marked in the mode of reception by the Sultan at the public audience given to an Ambassador.—This is well described by Madden in his travels, though we suspect, as usual, a little caricatured:

Nothing can exceed the ambition of the people of the embassy to attend the Ambassador, in their laced coats, at his audience with the Sultan; and nothing can equal the absurdity of that ceremony except its humiliation. The French have the priority in all public audiences. The Ambassador proceeds with his credentials to the Porte, passes through a large square thronged with soldiers, then through a garden where it is arranged the soldiers should, at that time, receive their pay-law, to astonish the infidels with the vastness of the Sultan's bounty. He next enters the divan, where a principal officer sits in great state on a splendid sofa, with a cadilesker on either side. Some cause here undergoes a mock trial, to prove to the unbelievers that his imperial highness is just, as well as generous; a number of money-bags, containing paras (the fourth of farthings) are pompously displayed at the payment of the troops, to show the gacious the inexhaustible wealth of the grand Seigneur. The officer in waiting now writes a letter to the Sultan, stating that a ghaour, an ambassador, comes to throw himself at his highness's feet, and to this the Sultan graciously replies. "Feed and clothe the infidel, and let him come." The infidel is accordingly fed, gets a good dinner, and during it, the Sultan is peeping through a lattice at his guest, where his person is hardly visible. The infidel is next clothed with a caftan, as are also a portion of his followers, who proceed to the audience-chamber, where the arms of the Ambassador are laid hold of by two assistants, and thus pinioned, he is led before the Sultan, and his body as much bowed as the force of the officers holding him admits of. The Sultan sits on a bed-shaped throne ornamented with black velvet and precious stones; his dress nothing peculiar to his station, but the diamond aigette and feather in his turban, and the diamond girdle around his loins. The Ambassador having bowed, remains covered, and makes his speech in French; the drogouman translates it; and then the principal officer of the sultan replies, and this reply again given in French to the Ambassador. During the ceremony, the Sultan hardly deigns to look at the Ambassador, or even to notice him on retiring. The infidels are then forced out of the presence, with their faces to the throne. At the outer gate a richly caparisoned horse is presented to the Ambassador; and the trappings which are principally of silver, are some time after, sold to an Armenian, who sells them again to the Porte for a future present. I saw the French ambassador's present thus disposed of. Such is the degradation which we suffer our Ambassadors to undergo, being stripped of their swords before they are admitted to the presence of the haughty Sultan.

BEER.

We have evidence of the use of this liquor for more than 2000 years. The Grecian poet and satirist Archilochus, who lived about 700 B. C., and the Grecian tragedians Æschylus and Sophocles, who lived more than 400 B. C., call it wine of barley. Diodorus of Sicily, who lived about the time of Julius Cæsar, about 50 B. C., mentions beer in his History (lib. i. chap. 20). Pliny also, about the middle of the first century after Christ, speaks of this beverage in several places of his Natural History. He says that it is prepared in different ways, and that there is a species more intoxicating than wine. He says, further, that, in Spain, it is called celsa and ceria; but, in Gaul and in other provinces of the Roman empire, cerevisia; that it was in general among the ancient Germans, who also called it cerevisia (from Ceres, the goddess of grain, and vis, power). The Egyptians, as the first promoters of agriculture, are said to have invented beer, and to have prepared a kind, in later times, at Pelusium, which was called by the name of that city, and was much celebrated. Beer was afterwards unknown in Egypt, until the French army introduced it anew, since which it is said that beer is still brewed there. We are ignorant how far the beer of the ancients resembled the modern article. The word beer may most naturally be derived from bibere, to drink.

ASKING A SMALL FAVOUR.

A few days since, as one of the Eastern steam-boats was about leaving the wharf, a passenger was asked to take charge of a letter to a friend in Boston. He did so, very readily, and others having the like favours to ask, applied to him in their turn. In a very accommodating manner, he accepted the additional charge, and soon had his pockets filled with letters. Others, emboldened by the readiness with which he undertook these little errands, applied to him to take charge of larger and more weighty articles—such as packages of wedding cake, patterns of the newest fashions, and such like matters, which, with the greatest good nature in the world, were also taken charge of by the accommodating passenger. "Wont you be kind enough," said a gentleman, "just to put this shawl in your pocket, and leave it at Mrs. Such-a-one's in Providence?" "Shall I trouble you," said another, "to take charge of this pine apple and hand it to my wife? I promised to send her one, and I wish you would be particular to deliver it into her own hands. I'm sorry to trouble you, sir, but—" He was now interrupted by a wag, who, seeing the disposition to impose upon good nature, bawled out, "Mister, I regret exceedingly to trouble you, but if your pockets are not full, you would oblige me very much by taking charge of a barrel of flour."

THE BARBER AND SAILOR.

A sailor went into a barber's shop, to have his beard taken off. The barber happened to have but one razor, and that for want of proper intimacy with the hone and strap, was rather dull.

The sailor took his seat, and the barber began to execute his office, and at every scrape, (which gave the sailor extreme pain,) he would cry, "Do I shave easy, sir? Do I shave easy, sir?" The sailor bore the scratching with a good deal of patience for some time; however, the barber taking him by the nose, and after several scrapes which made Jack think skin and all was gone by the board, continuing to repeat the question, "Do I shave easy, sir?" Jack gravely replied, "Honest friend, to answer your question, you must inform me what you are about; if you call it skinning, it is tolerable easy; but if you call it shaving it is devilish hard."

Subscribers to the Record who intend to discontinue their subscription at the expiration of the present volume, are requested to give us information thereof as soon as convenient. And those who are in arrears are desired to forward the amount of their bills (which may be ascertained by reference to our conditions) by mail. Notices of discontinuance should always be accompanied by the amounts due, and letters should invariably be post paid.

The principal argument urged against masonry is, that in the present "enlightened age" it is a useless institution. The most conspicuous seceders concur in acquitting the fraternity of guilt: some of them, indeed, to ingratiate themselves with the popular ferment, affect to believe that the masonic obligations may be interpreted by the ignorant and the vicious so as to countenance crime, but they pronounce the suspicions cast upon the institution by its noisy and dishonest opponents, to be at variance with the meaning attached by themselves to its ceremonies, and contrary to the experience of their lives. Those who have read Mr. Colden's or Mr. Sumner's Letter, or the reanunciation of Mr. Bradley, or of the twelve Seneca Masons, or of any one else who at the time of seceding was not hardened against the influence of justice, can bear testimony to the truth of what we have here said; for it is their common acknowledgment that masonry has been of benefit to the world—that in their experience they have found it to be a benevolent and moral institution, which fulfils its professions with more than ordinary honesty and exactness—and that a just interpretation of, and compliance with, its injunctions, can never be productive of evil, but may, on the contrary, be the source of essential benefits.

A great deal is said of the refinement of the present age—the "enlightened" state of the human mind. But are men more benevolent, philanthropic, or moral than they were in times past? Do they obey the calls of distress with greater alacrity? Are they more willing to "do as they would be done by?" or do they walk more uprightly? No—men are as prone to evil and hard-heartedness as they ever were, and they need as much encouragement to do good as they ever did. What consistency, then, is there in the assertion that the masonic institution is useless? If men are no more charitable and no more moral now than they were at its birth or organization, does not the same necessity for it exist? Masonry, instead of being persecuted as a useless remnant of antiquity, should be supported by all who wish well to their species, as a tried instrument of good. If benevolent works be worthless, then is masonry useless, but not without. The heartless speculators of the present generation may affect wisdom, and cry out against the workers of good in private; but who is there with a heart to feel for another's woe, who can contemplate even the "present happy and enlightened age," and rashly destroy every means which our fathers have left us, of enlisting the sympathies of the able in behalf of the needy and the oppressed?

ANTI-MASONICK NEWSPAPERS. These articles are ever and anon dropping into "the receptacle of things lost upon earth;" and there is reason to hope that the present year will relieve this state at least from a large portion of these nuisances which now afflict it. This is "a consummation devoutly to be wished." The people have been hard driven and hard ridden long enough to profit by the experience, and a relief from these machinations of iniquity will be esteemed a blessing of the first magnitude.

The National Observer, in this city, was found to be a losing concern and relinquished by B. D. Packard & Co. at the close of the first year of their proprietorship, last week. The paper has dwindled from a semi-weekly to a weekly and will go on for a month or two under the auspices of nobody knows whom. Solomon will continue to edit it, and we observe that he advertises proposals to publish a religious volume of 500 pages, written by himself—mere moonshine, to gull fools with.

The anti-masonic paper published at Kingston, Ulster county, has finished its earthly course, and departed to the more congenial regions of the infernal world. And there are sundry other oracles winding up their affairs to "do likewise." We wish them a speedy journey and an everlasting stay.

Island. There are about 50,000 inhabitants. They had some time ago a newspaper, but were unable to support it. They have a Bible Society, which has lately published a new translation of the New Testament, which is adopted in the place of a bad translation published by the British and Foreign Bible Society some years ago.

The finances of South Carolina are found to be in so prosperous a condition that the Comptroller recommends a reduction of the state taxes 20 to 30 per cent.

The "Foreign Review" says if the U. States ever obtain Cuba, the separation of the Union will follow within ten years.

Morton's comedy of "The Dramatist" has been translated into Spanish, by Don Telesforo de Trueba, and played fifty nights at Madrid.

The empire of Russia takes precedence of every other nation in Europe, as regards its extent and population. The numbers of the motley race by which it is tenanted amounted, at the close of 1828, to 62,502,000 souls, of whom the following is a classification by distinct nations:

1. Slavonians	54,000,000	of 7 grades.
2. Finlanders	3,000,000	11
3. Tartars	2,500,000	10
4. Caucasians	1,010,000	6
5. Germans	260,000	9
6. Moldavians	200,000	8
7. Reginians	100,000	7
8. Samojeds	70,000	14
9. Manners	65,000	3
10. Indians	25,000	3
11. Kamtschadales	12,000	3
12. Unknown origin	1,000,000	14

62,502,000 of 53 various grades or ranks of human beings.

In respect of religious creeds professed by this part-coloured multitude, it falls under the subsequent heads, according to an estimate made two years ago:

Greeks	45,300,000	Jamaites	210,000
Catholics	6,000,000	Reformed Church	84,000
Mahometans	3,300,000	Armenians	70,000
Lutherans	2,600,000	Hornuities	10,000
Shamanes	700,000	Mannites	6,000
Jews	600,000	Philanese	3,000

The population of Russia in Europe, independently of her Polish possessions (which in 1827 contained 3,650,436 souls), amounted in that year to 44,003,000, which is double that of Great Britain. Relatively to the other states of Europe, it is extremely thin of inhabitants, and stands inferior even to Norway and Sweden in density of population.

In financial respects, the following present general results for the year 1827:—

Revenue (Poland inclusive)	1,120,330,322 equal to 17,501,000.
Expenditure	1,135,484,000 equal to 16,935,000.
National Debt	3,300,000,000 equal to 37,500,000.

The military force consists—in infantry, of 23,800 guards and 394,000 of the line; in cavalry, of 63,300; of 24,000 irregulars; 300 pieces attached to the horse, and 720 pieces attached to the foot artillery, forming a total of 47,000. This is the amount of the regular establishment; but, in time of war, like the present, it is greatly augmented by levies under the imperial ukase. The Polish army consists of 20,000.

The Russian navy, at the beginning of 1828, comprised 50 ships of the line, 35 frigates, and above 100 other large vessels, besides floating batteries, gunboats, galleys, &c.—the whole manned by somewhat more than 50,000 sailors. This establishment has of late been considerably increased.

The whole empire does not present above 1640 cities and towns, 1210 strong places, and 537,490 villages and hamlets. Among the first mentioned are Petersburg, 335,000; Moscow, 260,000; Warsaw, 126,443; Kiev, 60,000; Sandomir, 25,000; Odessa, 40,000; Riga, 47,000; Tula, 36,000; Kaluga, 25,000; Kozna, 50,000; Astrachan, 36,000; and Irkutsk, 30,000.

The conclusion of Mr. Little's catalogue of School and Classical Books will be found on our last page.

PROSPECTUS OF THE

AMERICAN SPECTATOR,

And Washington City Chronicle.

The publishers of the WASHINGTON CITY CHRONICLE, having entered into an arrangement with the proprietor of the COLUMBIAN REGISTER, by which the two papers have been united, and believing that a partial modification of the original plan of their Journal will have a tendency to promote its usefulness, and place it on a more permanent basis, and having made the necessary provisions for this object, will henceforth issue their paper under the title of the "American Spectator, and Washington City Chronicle."

The leading objects of this paper will be, to furnish, in a condensed form, the great Benevolent Enterprises of the age, and to advocate their cause by every argument and motive which we may be able to wield; to note the advances of Truth, and to aid in its conflict with Error; to record the fresh accessions of Literature, and to awaken a recollection of its buried stores; to report the acquisitions of Science, and welcome their application to the Mechanick Arts; to sketch the Political Features of the Times, and give an outline of the movements of this City of Power.

In the duties of benevolence and self-sacrifice, we shall not be captious or censorious—we shall steadily appeal to the unchanging obligations of man to his Maker and to his fellow beings. In Literature, we pledge ourselves to the maxims of no school, but we shall ever linger longest at the shrine where genius has consecrated its quenchless energies to the high interest of humanity. In Science, we shall kindle most where we discover the brightest impress of utility. In Religion, we shall not be exclusive or sectarian: we shall welcome every thing good, in whatever denomination of christianism it may prevail; and shall with equal impartiality expose every thing evil, wherever it may be found—a man's conduct shall stamp his character and creed—the true shall be known by its fruits.

In Politics, we shall not be partisan, although we do not pledge ourselves to withhold a free expression of our opinions of the qualifications and conduct of those in power, or of those who may be candidates for these responsible stations. We hold it to be a duty in every man to keep a scrutinizing vigilance on those to whom our sacred rights and privileges are entrusted, and to remonstrate, in the language of unyielding piety and patriotism, when these trusts are profaned, or forgotten in the absorbing pursuit of self-aggrandizement.

That a paper so commanding in its objects, so liberal in its spirit, issuing from the capital of our country, if conducted with fidelity and energy, will be sustained by the publick, we cannot entertain a doubt. We would not solicit patronage from considerations of mere charity to ourselves, we intend to render every man a quid pro quo, and expect that our paper will stand by its merits, or fall by its worthlessness.

We shall ever be grateful for all pertinent communications to our columns—while, with a becoming spirit of self-reliance, we shall smite our own rock, and if the streams are not copious, we trust they will at least be pure.

Terms—Two dollars and fifty cents per annum, in advance; or three dollars, to be paid within three months after subscribing. For six months, one dollar and fifty cents—For three months, one dollar, in advance.

Any person who will obtain five responsible subscribers will be entitled to an additional copy, or its equivalent in money.

Subscribers at a distance, who are not known to the publishers or agents, will in all cases be expected to pay in advance.

All letters addressed to the publishers must be post paid, otherwise they will not be attended to.

MODERNITY AND LUXURY COMBINED.

The subscriber takes this method to return his grateful acknowledgments for the very liberal patronage extended to him the last season, and again begs leave to call the attention of the publick to his patent SOPH AND SETTEE BEDSTEAD. This article, yet but imperfectly known to the publick, is essentially different from any previous attempt to combine the Bedstead with the Sofa or Settee. It is constructed on principles peculiar to itself: with the size, strength, and convenience of the ordinary four post Bedstead, it possesses the symmetry, beauty and finish of the ornamental parlor Settee or Sofa. The bed and bedding are enclosed and again extended with the greatest ease, and without removing them from their place on the settee. To private gentlemen, or families boarding, they save the expense of an extra room. To invalids and those who would enjoy the luxury of sleeping by a parlor fire—in boarding house keepers—to the masters of vessels—to the owners of seating rooms, &c. they are perfectly invaluable.

N. B. The Patentee, now, for the first time, offers for sale Patent Rights to applicants in any part of the United States. The subscriber has constantly on hand, at his Ware Room and Factory, No. 123 Grand street, an assortment of the article, where he will be pleased to see all those who take an interest in inventions calculated to promote comfort and economy.

POETRY.

From the New-England Weekly Review.

'T WAS BUT A BUBBLE.

'T was but a bubble,—yet 'twas bright,
And gaily danced along the stream
Of Life's wild torrent, in the light
Of sunbeams sparkling,—like a dream
Of Heaven's bliss, for loveliness,—
For fleetness, like a passing thought;
And ever of such hopes as this,
The tissue of my life is wrought.
For I have dreamed of pleasure, when
The sun of young existence smiled
Upon my wayward path: and then
Her promised sweets my heart beguiled.
But when I came those sweets to sip,
They turned to gall, upon my lip.
And I have dreamed of Friendship too;
For, Friendship, I had thought was made
To be man's solace in the shade,
And glad him in the light,—and so
I madly thought to find a friend,
Whose soul, with mine, might sweetly blend
And, as two placid streams unite,
And roll their waters in one bright
And tranquil current to the sea,
So might our happy spirits be Borne onward to Eternity.
But he betrayed me,—and, with pain,
I woke—to sleep and dream again.
And then I dreamed of Love,—and all
The clustered visions of the past
Seemed airy nothings, to that last
Bright dream. It threw a magical
Enchantment on existence,—cast
A glory on my path, so bright,
I seemed to breathe, and feel its light.
But, now, the blissful dream is o'er,
And I have waked,—to dream no more.
Beyond each distant glimmering star,
That twinkles in the arch above,
There is a world of truth and love,
Which earth's vile passions never mar.
O could I snatch the eagle's plumes,
And soar to that bright world, away,
Which God's own holy light illumines,
With glories of eternal day.
How gladly every lingering tie,
That binds me down to Earth, I'd sever,
And leave, for that blest home, on high,
This hollow-hearted world, forever.

THY WILL BE DONE.

Thy will be done! how hard a thing to say,
When sickness ushers in death's dreary knell;
When eyes that lately sparkled bright and gay,
Wander around with dimly conscious ray,
To some familiar face to bid farewell!
Thy will be done! the faltering lips deny
A passage to the tones as yet unheard;
The sob convulsed, the raised and swimming eye,
Seem as appealing to their God on high
For power to breathe their yet imperfect word.
Orphan! who watcheth by the silent tomb
Where those who gave these life all coldly sleep;
Or thou who bittest in thy desolate home,
Calling to those beloved who cannot come,
And, thinking o'er thy loneliness, dost weep!
Widow! who musest over by-gone years
Of life, and love, and happiness, with him
Who shared thy joys and sorrows, hopes and fears,
Who now art left to shed unnoticed tears,
Till thy fit cheek is wan, and eyes grow dim!
Husband! who dreamest of thy gentle wife,
And still in fancy see'st her rosy smile
Brightening a world of bitterness and strife;
Who from the lonely future of thy life
Turnest, in dreaminess, to weep the while!
Mother! whose prayers could not avail to save
Him whom thou lovedst most, thy blue-eyed boy!
Who with a bitter agony dost rave
To the wild winds that fan his early grave,
And dashest from thy lip the cup of joy!
And thou! not widowed, yet bereaved one,
Who, buried in thy tearless, mute despair,
Roamest a desert world alone—alone,
To seek him out who from thine eyes is gone,
Scarce able to believe he is not there!

Mourners! who linger in a world of woe!
Each bowing 'neath his separate load of grief—
Turn from the silent tomb—and, kneeling low
Before that throne at which the angels bow,
Invoke a God of mercy for relief!

Pray that ye too may journey, when ye die,
To that far world where blessed souls are gone;
And, through the sob of agony,
Raise, with a voice resigned, the humble cry,
"Father—Creator—Lord! thy will be done!"

HOMEWARD BOUND.

On! on! thou eagle pinioned bark,
Haste on thy watery way!
Thou'lt meet the tempest wild and dark
For many a weary day,
For many a day, and many a night,
Thou'lt plough the billow deep,
Or o'er the crested waves, in light
Majestic beauty sweep
Spread, spread abroad thy glorious wings,
And court each wandering breeze,
That aye, to meet thy wooing, springs,
Thou daughter of the seas!
They come! they come! the weakening gales,
Their eager kiss I feel,
Lo! with their full tide swell thy sails,
And flies thy sparkling keel!
Onward! thou gallant ship! nor fear
The raving tempest's wrath—
Outbrave it all, and boldly steer
Right on thy homeward path!
I long to hear the Ocean's foam
Dash on my native strand;
I long to breathe the gales that come
From my own father's land!
I long to roam the verdant hills,
To climb the rock-built mountains;
I long to chase the sportive rills,
The bubbles from the fountains;
For still, though years upon my brow
A manlier shade have hung,
My heart's warm currents briskly flow,
And still my soul is young.
I long, oh! how I long to see
The elm o'er shadow'd cot;
Of all this clouded world to me
The only sunny spot.
My home! how sweet the sound! my home!
Scene of my Eden hours—
Where Love, and Joy, and Pleasure bloom!
Life's bright perennial flowers.

THE POET AND DEATH.

AN APOLOGUE.

POET.

Linger, oh! linger yet, a little while,
Angel of Death, and let me follow on
The bearded monarch of all ages gone,
To steal from him the shadow of a smile,
Such as my childhood gave away to him;
I cannot brook the grave, where all is dim;
Let me live on awhile!

DEATH.

Live on! and lo! where, on Apollo's car,
Time rides triumphant!—hold this prism high,
And catch the melting beauty of the sky,
Or feast upon the glory of a star.
Take from the golden charioter his lyre,
And let thy rapid fingers move along
With the full flood of song;
Thou hast thy heart's desire.
But mark not ere the blazing steeds of day
Have run their course again, thy heart shall pray
To slumber in the grave;—the painted fly
That basks upon the dew-distilling flower,
Outlives thee in the one eternal eye!
Live on thy little hour,
And when thy beacon sickens with its woe,
Ask me, in vain! thou shalt not find repose.

THE DOCTORS.

BY T. HOOD.

Be honour which to kings we give
To doctors also paid:—
We're the king's subjects while we live,
The doctors' when we're dead.
Though when in health and thoughtless mood,
We treat them oft with scoffing;
Yet they, returning ill with good,
Relieve us from our coughing. [coddin]

At times they kill us, to be sure,
In cases rather tickle—
But when they've killed—they still can cure
Their patients—in a pickle.

And when at last we needs must die,
The doctors cannot save
From death—they still most kindly try
To match us from the grave.

MASONICK RECORD.

ADDRESS,

Delivered to a Church Conference, in Monson, Massachusetts, April 15, 1829.

BY THE PASTOR OF THE CHURCH.

My Brethren—I suppose, from what I have said to individuals, there is an expectation in the minds of some that I shall on this occasion, make a statement of my views and feelings in relation to masonry! Indeed, a wish has been expressed by some of you, and by others, whose opinion I respect, that I should, in a publick manner, make such a statement. And perhaps justice to myself and to you requires that I should do it; since erroneous reports have gone abroad as to the course I have taken, and since so much has been said and such strong feelings excited in this matter. If I hesitate at all, it is from the fear, that the spirit which has been awakened and raged, is not sufficiently calm to permit any thing which I shall say, to have its proper weight. But my brethren, I am happy to believe, that your convictions will not lead you to conclude, that after having laboured for your good so long, I can now, designedly say any thing which will tend to do you an injury.

We are all aware that the state of feeling among us is most unhappy; and we do perhaps, when we stop to reflect, grieve in view of it, and tremble, too, for the consequences, unless some change for the better shall speedily take place. I am willing to do any thing that I can consistently with what I deem to be duty, to satisfy the minds of my brethren, who are disturbed on the subject of masonry, so far as it relates to myself; and more than this you will not ask. I do not intend to criminate or censure any one, in the remarks which I shall make. Whatever may have been said or done by any of my brethren or myself, under the excitement of feeling, which may be considered improper and wrong, I am persuaded we shall mutually be disposed to acknowledge, and forgive, and forget.

That some, who are not masons, should have honest prejudices against the masonick institution, and conscientious scruples as to its tendency, I fully believe; and that good and candid men, who read the anti-masonick publications of the day, and receive the testimony and statements they give against the order, as universally true, should be excited to opposition, is not at all to be wondered at. And I certainly wish to treat with tenderness and deference the feelings of my brethren who are in this condition. I do not suppose, nor would I intimate, that they are excited on the subject without what they honestly think to be sufficient reason. No doubt, were I in their situation, with the same honest prejudices, and receiving the same impressions from the publications of the enemies of masonry, I should feel as they do. To treat their feelings, therefore, with lightness, as, in their apprehension, unfounded, is far from my heart. And if at any time I have seemed to do it, when on expressing my views I was constrained to differ from them, I do sincerely regret it. That I could not at once feel as they do, and that I cannot imbibe the same spirit which they have, from the anti-masonick publications of the day, many of which I have read, they must not think strange. On this subject, confessedly on their part, not to be ranked among immoralities and damnable heresies, we may differ in opinion, and still not "judge one another and set at nought one another."

You will allow me to have, some personal knowledge of masonry. And I cannot have been so long a time with you, the object of your observation and remark in a great variety of situations, and yet now be obliged to appeal to witnesses, or to use arguments to resist any objection, that I am not deserving, equally with others, the confidence of my brethren; or that I do not speak and act on the matter in question, the genuine convictions of my own mind. On things which relate to this subject, that are beyond my knowledge, I have no other means of forming an opinion than you have. And we have a mutual right to express our opinion, when formed, if it does not injure our neighbour. You will allow, too, that I am capable of judging in relation to the nature and tendency of the genuine principles of masonry, so far as they have come under my own observation: and I am sure, from what you know of the course of my preaching and labours among you, that you would not suppose I could, knowingly, call evil good, and good evil.

That freemasonry is a human institution, i. e. that its organization, as to the arrangement of its principles and the invention of its forms, originated in the wisdom of man, is what I have always supposed. But its principles, so far as they are founded in the nature of things, must have existed. Thus the principles of human knowledge, of order, and beauty, of virtue, justice, truth and charity,—the truths involved in the being and government of God, and the things revealed, respecting his attributes, and respecting the character and end of man, and respecting the duties which we owe to God, ourselves, and our fellow creatures, have ever existed. These are things incorporated and urged in the principles of masonry, so far as I know them. And can I say that they are wicked, and of dangerous tendency? To my knowledge there is no instruction given in masonry, which is inconsistent with those principles, and which does not inculcate them, and often in a most solemn manner. As to its forms and obligations, as I know them and have ever understood them, and as I suppose my brethren know them and understand them, I have never thought them at variance with its principles, or unsuitable for a good man to take upon himself. And I have never seen any thing in the work and doings of a lodge, which was immoral and wicked, which intermeddled with political affairs, or infringed at all upon the laws of our country, and which tended to weaken moral obligation, and to prevent the good citizen from doing his duty without partiality. On the contrary, I have seen benefits of no small value to individuals and society from the institution.*

If injustice and oppression or other iniquities have been practiced in connexion with masonry, or if individual masons have been guilty of crimes, there is nothing in the principles, or instructions, or obligations, or forms of the order, so far as I know and understand them, which requires or justifies these things. Is it credible that the lodge should be under obligation to discipline and expel its members for open immoralities, and yet demand and conceal the perpetration of the highest crimes! On the contrary, its principles require uprightness of conduct before God and man; and explicitly and directly teach, that the bible is the only guide of our faith and practice. They teach charity, temperance, chastity, and to be good and true, urging the whole by a regard to death and a future state. All this, so far as I know and understand these principles, is essential to their nature. Now I will appeal to you, my brethren, whether I can denounce these things as evil and wicked, and tending to destroy civil liberty and religion?

That there may be masons who are unprincipled and wicked, I readily concede. And there may be lodges composed of such men. Where this is the case, the principles and object of the institution will be misunderstood, or perverted, or disregarded. Evils may be committed under the cover of secrecy, and wicked designs accomplished and injustice practiced, under the pretended sanctions of the masonick connexion. For wicked men will act wickedly in every situation; and they will pay no regard to the good principles which they may profess to receive, whenever they can with safety. But I have never personally known any such things in connexion with the lodge. And considering the different religious and political sentiments, and the different callings and interests of those who compose the lodges, it seems to me next to impossible that they should ever be able to unite, were it proposed, in any combination against church or state. Indeed, any proposition of this kind would violate established rules, and be treated with merited censure. But, my brethren, it is not my wish to enter into a laboured defence of masonry, but barely to tell you how I understand it, and that is in my estimation, innocent, as to its principles, of the charges of depravity which have been alleged against it. I do not suppose that the institution cannot be perverted to wicked and immoral purposes; nor do I suppose that it is necessary to the existence and happiness of society, or to the good character, usefulness and salvation of individuals, more than other institutions which might be named. But its principles that forbid it to contribute any thing to these important ends, and even stand in the way of them, as its enemies allege, I have not been able to learn from anything which I know of their nature. From my knowledge and views of the order, I consider it, therefore, lawful for me to be a mason, and to meet with the lodge; and that I have the right and the privilege to do so.

* In the lodge in this place (and I never sat in any other,) I have seen the members improving, in the use of a small but well selected library, and in listening to frequent addresses on moral and religious subjects. I have seen the annual contributions, for some years, of from twenty to thirty dollars, presented to the cause of foreign missions; and the liberal donation repeatedly given to the indigent and worthy brother. And I have led and joined in the prayer, in the name of Christ, at the opening and closing of the lodge.

The motives, my brethren, which influenced me to become a mason, I thought at the time, and still think, were right. When I first devoted myself to the ministry, it was with the hope that I might be the humble instrument of doing good to my fellow men. And with whatever society I have mingled, and with whatever people I have associated, this has been my leading aim. Like the apostle, and in the same sense, I have "become all things to all men, if by any means I might save some." A lodge existed in this place, and after examination, I judged it right for me to enter it; and it was with the hope, that I might do good in that connexion. That any would be offended with this step, I did not even suspect. It is not for me to say, but others say, that the effect has been beneficial in no small degree. With regard to myself, I make no pretensions; "for I am less than least of all," who minister at the altar. I have come far short of what it was in my heart to do for the cause of righteousness, but I have thought were the institution under the sole controul of those who were filled with the love of Christ, that it would be a powerful instrument in promoting his cause; and that good might still result from my continuing to attend the meetings of the lodge. But, my brethren, I am, from the heart, disposed to respect your conscientious scruples on this point, and regret that I should be, in this matter, the occasion of grief to any of you, as christians. And I trust you will have the same regard to my feelings, and would equally regret to be the occasion of grief to me. To show you, my brethren, that I am sincere in my regard to the feelings of those of you who profess to be grieved, I have said, and now say again, that I will as your pastor relinquish attending the lodge, in present circumstances, and so long as the same or similar circumstances may seem to me to render it expedient and my duty. By present circumstances, I mean the conscientious scruples and feelings which you have, and the excitement prevails, on the subject of masonry. So long as I deem it my duty, on this account, not to attend upon the lodge, I shall, of course, have nothing more to do with masonry than you or others have, viz: the right of expressing my opinion with regard to it, whenever I think proper. In this, I go upon the principle which the apostle recommends, in what I conceive to be similar circumstances, and hope I shall ever be willing to do so, namely, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no more flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." He does not say that meat was evil in itself, and that eating it was evil to him, but for the sake of his brethren, who were offended at his liberty in this indifferent matter, he would deny himself the privilege of eating any more flesh.

But, my brethren, if I concede to you a right and a privilege, which I consider I have liberty to enjoy, I hope you will not think that I infringe on your liberty, if I merely ask you to reflect, whether, if I am grieved with your meat, you ought not to say, that you "will eat no flesh," so long as this is the case? I must tell you in a spirit of love, (for I do hope that I am actuated by nothing else in this affair,) that I have been grieved, with what has appeared to me to be a feeling of censoriousness and uncharitableness, an alienation of feeling towards me, for no other cause, professedly, than because I was a mason. If I am mistaken in this, or if I have exhibited a similar spirit at any time, I do very much regret it. Now if there have been wrong feelings on your part or on mine, it has been owing to the anti-ma-

* It doubtless has been perverted in many instances; it certainly will be perverted, if all good men forsake it, or are driven out of it. In such a case, evil might be prevented, should the institution come to exist.

sonick publications of the day, as the primary exciting cause. Were they candid and fair in their statements; did they represent the thing as it is, with all its attending circumstances, and not labour to wake up prejudices and inflame passions, no excitement would be occasioned. But as it is, I grieved and other brethren are grieved that circulate and read them. If you do not mean to make masonry a point of absolute separation, a mark of division, a matter which unfits for church fellowship, an offence for excommunication, then it is morally impossible that christian love and harmony should be found in this church, while you continue to seek after, and read, and be influenced by these inflammatory papers, many of which I have read. If you wish for peace and harmony, standing together as we now do in a church, which rests, we trust, upon a foundation which God hath laid, I do think you should relinquish your right to read, and circulate, and urge upon others, those publications which have been the cause of all the disturbance and wrong feelings that may have existed among us of late. But with regard to this, you must be guided by your own sense of duty, only taking care that you "let your light so shine before men that they, beholding your good works, may glorify your Father who is in heaven."

Believing, brethren, that you are conscientious in your objections to masonry, and to me, because I am a mason, you do doubtless feel equally grieved with your other brethren who are masons; for if I am wrong in this matter they are under the same condemnation; if I have incurred censure they have incurred the same; if I ought to be dealt with, they ought also to be dealt with. But I presume, dear brethren, you are not willing to say, that we, as masons, some for five and ten, and some for fifteen and twenty-five years and upwards, have been engaged in promoting the cause of vice, or that we have now risen up against the cause of righteousness and truth.* I presume, too, that will not say you have been the authors of that excitement among us on the subject of masonry, and that the evil consequences of it must be laid to our charge. This would be evidently too uncharitable to be entertained by that love which "thinketh no evil." The excitement will be ascribed to its proper cause, the influence of the anti-masonick publications of the day. The spirit which these avowen is most evidently not a spirit of piety; but one with which piety has no fellowship. It is at war with christian feeling, and with the work of God. However useful these publications may be to others, they certainly promise no good to us. I cannot think they will aid us at all, in promoting our own salvation or that of others. If masonry is a wicked thing, the revival of God's work; the success of the gospel, the prevalence of true godliness will put it down. Let us then unite our efforts to promote the cause of Christ, the triumphs of the cross over the hearts of men; and show, by our earnest prayers, our holy example, our godly conversation, our zeal for the truth, our christian liberality, that we have the benevolence of Christ, and are truly engaged in removing whatever hinders the advancement of his kingdom of righteousness. These are the weapons which we are authorised to use. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God."

"Brethren, the time is short." The space of a hand's breadth, only, have we, to lay up treasure in heaven, to secure the salvation of our families, and to promote the glory and interests of the church. And shall this be wasted, or improved in disputing about things which I verily believe we shall find not profit?

Brethren, you very much mistake my feelings if you suppose that in those sermons and addresses of mine, which some found fault with, as personal, I had any more special reference to them than to others.† That what I said was truth, you do not question; and I verily thought it was truth suited to us all, at this time of confessed stupidity, declension and wickedness. As to my preaching, I hope to be enabled always to commend the word to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

But, my brethren, if you judge it will be for your peace and harmony, and for the interest of the cause of Christ in this place, that I should leave you, I am ready and willing to go. But in this case you would wish to do justice by me; and to have me go honourably and peaceably. You would not destroy my character and standing as a minister; nor will you suppose that it is necessary to make difficulty, to stir up contention, in order to accomplish the object of my dismission. If, as a church, you should advise me to ask for this, I should, doubtless, be disposed to comply. Then a council would be called, my case would be tried at the proper tribunal, and the matter soon decided.

But if I continue with you, I wish to continue in peace, and with the confidence and affection of my brethren, whom I have ever loved, and ever should love, although they may be (only for a moment, I trust) alienated from me. I am not sensible, my brethren, that my affection for you is partial, unless it be so to love those most who exhibit most of the image of Christ.

* There are seventeen resident members of the church who are masons, and in point of christian character, standing, benevolence and usefulness in the church, and in point of respectability, and of exerting a good influence in society, and of the ability and disposition to discharge the duty of worthy citizens, they must be regarded as not inferior to their brethren who are not masons.

† It was supposed by some of the brethren that the sermons alluded to were designed as personal reproaches to them, for the anti-masonick views and feelings which they had manifested. It was suggested, too, that I was partial to masons in my attachments and visits. This will explain some remarks in this part of the address.

Finally, my brethren, let us render to each other due benevolence, respect and kindness. Let our strife be in the christian race, and not concerning things which are unprofitable and vain. "Let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race set before us, pressing toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus; for we must all appear before the judgement seat of Christ."

THE REVIEW.

From the London Times, of November 27, 1829.

UNANIMITY OF JURORS ON CRIMINAL TRIALS.

On the question of the necessity of unanimity in juries in criminal trials, which has been so prominently brought before the public by the late proceedings at Cork, there has been sent us a very clever and ingenious pamphlet, published some years, entitled "Observations on the English Jury Laws in Criminal Cases, with respect to the distinction between Unanimous Verdicts and Verdicts by a Majority," from which we shall make no apology for making some extracts. It is well known that different rules prevail in the different countries in which jury trials exist, as to the requisite of their verdict. In Scotland, where the jury consists of 15, a bare majority of opinions is sufficient to decide their verdict. In France, where 12 compose a jury, two-thirds of the members, or eight, must concur in opinion to render valid a verdict of guilty. In England, it is superfluous to mention that unanimity is requisite in all cases of condemnation. Each of these systems is defended by its respective partisans, and its own separate grounds, and we shall not stop to discuss their merits. But unanimity being required in England, it behooves us to see, either that unanimity is obtained, or that, if their is doubt, the defendant should have the benefit of that doubt. The necessity of this rule is forcibly stated in the following passage:—

"It is the same case with an English jury:—Suppose the jury enclosed, and consequently excluded from all further information on the question of the murder. Three of this jury shall, we assume, be persuaded of the prisoner's innocence, and nine of his guilt. Were this in Scotland, or in France, the majority would be sufficient to condemn, and the number of that majority would be declared in court; but in England it is very different;—The jury are not here 12 separate men; they are one body, whose collected opinion is to be declared by their foreman. There are, then, doubtless in the mind of that body; and the prisoner has a right, a legal right to have those doubts of his guilt interpreted in his favour. If the three who think him innocent were to agree to a verdict of guilty, they would be perjured. They would become the executioners of an innocent man; for to them he would be innocent. It is otherwise with the nine. They think him guilty; but their opinion is not the opinion of the whole body. They are only the alternately preponderating weights in the scale of a single mind. It is not so much in one scale, and nothing, (or what we count as nothing) in the other. The weights on either end of the beam are, in our argument, assumed to be of the same quality. They differ in amount but neither of them are worthless. Each scale is attended to. The balance vibrates—there is doubt. If the lighter scale be fixed to the beam, it is a jury of nine. If the proportion of the two, with regard to the quality alone, be considered, we divide truth into parcels that oppose one another;—we have the decision by majority.

"Were this a case of mere probabilities, resolvable by the doctrine of chances—were it a life-insurance that might be calculated from the tables of Dr. Price and Mr. Morgan, we might then say, (supposing the jurors to be equally wise,) that it was nine to three against the person accused; and we might reasonably conclude that, if there were a multitude of similar cases, in each of which there were recorded a verdict of guilty, out of every 12, so convicted, there would be three innocent men, who would suffer the sentence of the law,

This is the unvarnished tale of what, it is to be feared, often happens in countries where the juries decide by majority; but there must be something very different, whatever that something may be, in the verdicts of our juries; for decision by majority is not the law of England. A Scotch jury literally says. 'There are eight of us who think that the prisoner is guilty, and seven who believe him to be innocent;' and the man is hanged upon this comparison of probabilities; but such a verdict would not be recorded in an English court; or, if it were, it would be an equivalent to not guilty."

We can only find room for the following passage:—"There is often an unconquerable belief of the guilt of the accused, although the evidence be extremely defective. In such a case a Scotch jury return a verdict of not proven. The English jury have no such salvo for their consciences. They either say guilty or not guilty. But can their feelings or conviction be the same, under these circumstances, as when the evidence is clear and uncontradicted? The verdict is in the same language, but is not dictated by the same mind; and therefore the words guilty and not guilty, refer to nothing that is precisely determined with regard to criminality: they are the fiat of the jury:—'Let him be condemned,' or 'Let him be acquitted:—'Let him die,' or, 'Let him live!' It by no means follows, from a verdict of acquittal, that the jury have been convinced of his innocence. It were well for him if he could, but he is not bound to produce evidence to a negative, so as to demonstrate the purity of his conduct. It is the accuser, not the accused, who has pledged himself to proof; and if the charge be not proved to the satisfaction of the whole of the jury, the foreman, speaking in their name, is obliged, if he would not perjure himself, to say not guilty. This is no declaration of his innocence, for that the jury can seldom know, that they were not empanelled to try it. It merely announces that they are not unanimous in their belief of his having committed the crime imputed to him; and therefore they are unanimous in the opinion that, as a body, they should not be justified in delivering him over into the hands of the executioner. A perfect conviction of his innocence cannot possibly be required at their hands, otherwise our boasted trial by jury would be the most horrid tribunal on earth."

"Viewing the subject in this light, and it is truly astonishing that it should ever have been seen in any other, the jury of the law of this country is peculiarly entitled to the epithet humane. No narrow majority of bigotry or ignorance can wrest from an Englishman his liberty or his life. In the days of Alfred, Cadwaine was hanged for sentencing a man to death without the assent of all the 12 jurors; and the Founders of the English law have, with excellent forecast, contrived, that no man should be called to answer to the King for any capital crime, unless upon the preparatory accusation of 12 or more of his fellow-subjects, the Grand Jury; and that the truth of every accusation, whether preferred in the shape of an indictment, information or appeal, should afterwards be affirmed by the unanimous suffrage of 12 of his equals and neighbours, indifferently chosen and superiour to all suspicion!† It is respecting the truth (not the falsehood) of the accusation that they are required to be unanimous."

"The unanimity of juries, thus understood, would save much of the time that is wasted, by their retiring, for hours, to dispute with one another on the criminality of the accused. The difference of opinion would immediately produce an unanimous verdict, that they did not, with one voice, find him guilty; or in other words, that he was not guilty; and to endeavour to disturb the opinions that are expressed in his favour would be to cater for the executioners."

"This acute little pamphlet, bearing the signature of 'ANTIDRACO,' is, we have reason to believe, the production of Mr. Booth, the author of an Analytical and Etymological Dictionary of the English language, the two first parts only of which has been published, because the work has not met with that encouragement which its great merits would have led us to expect for it."

DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.

A distinguished seaman of Copenhagen has addressed a letter containing very curious historical information, to a gentleman in this city. He is engaged in the compilation of a work on the voyage of the discovery of North America, undertaken by inhabitants of the North of Europe before the time of Columbus. He has in his hands genuine ancient documents, the examination of which, leads to curious and surprising results, well worthy in themselves of fixing the attention of the philosopher and historian. They furnish various and unquestionable evidence, not only that the coast of North America was discovered soon after the discovery of Greenland, towards the close of the tenth century, by northern explorers, a part of whom remained there, and that it was again visited in the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries, but also that Christianity was introduced among the aborigines. In the names of the northern American places, traces of the Scandinavian descent of the early settlers are found. The documents mentioned above, supply materials for a Map of the northern coast of America, which will be annexed to the digest commentary to be prepared by the writer of the letter.

The northern adventurers had their principal station at the mouth of the river St. Lawrence; and Gaspe Bay was a prominent rendezvous; but it is affirmed to be clear from the records that they were acquainted with the coast much farther south, even as far down as the Carolinas. It was in the year 985, that America was first discovered by Baiske Herjulfson, but he did not land. In the year 1000, or perhaps earlier, the coast was visited by Leif, a son of Erick the Red, who first colonized Greenland. Of all the northern navigators who succeeded in the same way, Thouggfinn Carbefene is the one from whom the most circumstantial reports have been transmitted. From his son Snorre, who was born in America, and left it with his parents when he was three years old, descended in the 2d generation, three of Iceland's first and most celebrated bishops, Thorlac, Biom and Brand, and in the 9th generation, Judge Hank, so justly celebrated in the literary history of Iceland, by whom a number of Sogas were composed. He lived in the 12th, and in the beginning of the 13th century. Part of his works in his own hand writing are now in the possession of the Danish savant. We have thus communicated the substance of this gentleman's letter, and are inclined to believe with him, that he will be able to throw fresh light on what he calls the antiquities of North America, by means of his erudite researches. He is anxious to know whether interest will be taken in the enterprise in the United States. Certainly the subject is fitted to excite the minds of our literati, but it can not be deemed new to them. Washington Irving notices the legends of the Shandinavian voyagers in his life of Columbus, and particularly some passages of the appendix. We must add, however, that he was not apprised of the nature and extent of the Danish testimony.

SAM PATCH.

The following eulogy of this celebrated jumper is said to be from the pen of Robert Walsh, Esq. of Philadelphia.

To what end serve the mighty tomes of history, from the Cyropædia of Xenophon, to the Life of Napoleon by Sir Walter Scott, but to show the course of vaulting ambition, to point to the powers which have heralded the outgoings of him who was dedicated to fame, and to mark the hic jacet when he is gathered to his kindred dust. If a proper reflection is made upon the useless, and perhaps wicked course of those who claim notoriety by extraordinary eccentricities, the great moral end is answered, let the deed be what it may.

When the leader of the French armies gained the pinnacle of the Alps, and stood upon their snow-clad points, gazing down upon kingdoms that seemed almost to invite his way, he must have felt an elevation of soul, a gush of high enjoyment, that the view of a conquered army could scarcely equal—the distant valleys dotted with cities and habitations, and around him men whose hearts he commanded, the "all hail" of victory within his grasp, it was a sensation to which few in this life may hope to attain. Yet even these he shared in part with the thousands around him whose fealty he held by allowing participation in his glory.

And what was Sam Patch's sensation when he had ascended the bustling and dizzy height of Niagara, as the stream passed beneath him with deafening clamor, and threw wide around its spray, that danced in the sunbeams like childhood's hopes; when he looked far down upon the sea of upturned visages that were marked with painful anxiety for his descent.

He knew that he stood alone—the single point of expectancy, the observed of all observers—None shared in his honors, for none dared participate in his danger—and if a thought passed his mind in the wild triumph over public curiosity, of the benefits that might result from his perilous career, doubtless his heart whispered that pre-eminence was worth the risk, and that his sacrifices were from his own fold, while thousands had achieved a name of greatness by offering the flocks of others, or acquired a fame for goodness by serving upon their own board a destitute neighbour's solitary lamb which lay in his bosom, and was to him as a child.

Sam had marked the course of those who in olden times burst upon the admiration of the world; and he saw their honors won with crime. The reckless Persian fattened with the bones and blood of millions the soil of Greece—the hero of Thermopylae, and him of Marathon and of Leuctra, consecrated their stories with blood; the Ephesian aspired to immortality by the demolition of the sacred fane. Greece, Rome, Carthage, and the moderns, have seen their heroes only conspicuous as they stood upon the heaps of their sacrificed kind.—These things had Sam seen, and he sought an avenue to distinction where he alone should sustain the risk, as he should acquire the honor—He fell indeed, but it was from a glorious height, and it is immortality itself even to fail in such a vast design.

Go then, say to the Sacristan of the Temple of Fame, clear the Niche, and place the pedestal for Patch, and let the priest who ministers in his immortality make it the panegyric of Sam, that his ambition was satisfied without bloodshed—and his patriotism was pure, for he fell in his country's FALLS.

A MEXICAN LADY.

A young married lady, who, as the newspapers are wont sometimes to say, was in that state in which "ladies wish to be who love their lords," finding herself excessively oppressed with the heat of the weather, although she had thrown the windows and doors open to cool the room, and had likewise poured water over herself to refresh her body, adopted the following expedient, as she herself assured me one day when I paid her a visit. I must give the history in her own words: "I made (said she) a large hole in the floor, by first removing the bricks. Into this hole I poured a sufficient quantity of water to knead up a large portion of earth; which I did first with a stick, and afterwards with my hands, till the mass was as thick as paste. I then undressed myself entirely, and entered the hole, in which I sat down, and besmeared every part of my body; and as I found myself very comfortable and refreshed, I lay down and rolled myself in the mud." It is necessary here to remark, that this lady, although scarcely 20 years of age, is so fat, as to be nearly as broad as she is long. She added, "When my husband returned from business to dinner, will you believe it, that, with my large figure, and my being completely covered with mud, he imagined that he beheld a monster rise as it were, out of the bowels of the earth; and he stood some moments looking in amazement, unable to imagine what sort of animal had got into his house; and although I spoke to him, scarcely could he believe that the voice proceeded from his wife, but from 'a new species of quadruped not known in this country.'" The lady, who is wife to one of the elders of the State Congress, told me the story with so great a degree of pleasure, as kept her in constant laughter: she even insisted upon showing me the bath, which she still kept open as a refuge from the hot weather. I praised her good taste, and told her I thought she ought to have a monument erected to commemorate the invention of so great a luxury! [Hardy's Mexico.]

NAPOLEON'S FIRST ATTEMPT AT FORTIFICATION.

M. Bourrienne, in his recently published Memoirs, contradicts the fable, so gratuitously invented, of Napoleon's secluding and fortifying himself in his garden when at school. The following, according to our author, is the true version of the origin of this story:—In the winter of 1783-4, so memorable for the quantity of snow which blocked up the roads, and accumulated on the roofs and courts of houses, and over the face of the whole country in short, to six, seven, and eight feet in height, Napoleon felt particularly annoyed; no more gardens, no more of the happy seclusions which he so much affected. In his hours of recreation he was forced to mix himself with the crowd of his comrades, and, like them, to walk up and down an immense room. In his desire to shake off this monotonous inactivity, Napoleon was able to set all the school in motion, by showing his comrades that they could find a much better amusement than their eternal walking to and fro, if they would procure shovels, and open passages through the snow in the principal court-yard, erect horn-works, excavate trenches, raise parapets, cavaliers, &c. "When the work is finished, we may," said he, "divide ourselves into platoons, and form a kind of siege; and, as inventor of the new amusement, I will undertake to direct the attacks." The proposal was received with joy; it was executed, and this sham war in miniature was continued for fifteen days. It was put an end to at length; for, some gravel or small stones having got mixed in the snowballs, it happened that several of the boys, both besiegers and besieged, were seriously hurt. I remember that I was one who suffered mostly from this species of shot.

The New-York Truth Teller gives the following, "bit" from somebody's journal, published in the London Sailor's Magazine. We republish it for the amusement of our readers.

A CURIOUS SAILOR ANECDOTE.

Friday 13th.—An old sailor, who is well known in the North as a beggar, called at a minister's, door in Arbroath. The servant who answered the door, on seeing the well-known customer, said, "You can't get any thing to-day." "I'm not seeking any thing," replied the old boy; "I, the minister within?" "I believe he is," said the girl. "Would you tell him that I would like to speak with him?" The minister, on being informed, that some person wanted to see him at the door, came out, and asked what was wanted. "Well, Sir, I find that I am getting older every day, and old age does not come of itself; I am beginning to think now about another world, and I have just come to get some instruction from you, Sir, about it." The minister brought him into the kitchen, and asked what profession he had followed in his younger years. "O why, I have been on board a man-of-war the most of my life." "Can you pray any?" "O no, Sir, I have just come to get instructions from you." "Can't you say the Lord's Prayer?" "No, Sir, but I'll follow you, if you please." "Well, say, 'Our Father, which art in heaven,'"—"Our Father, who art in heaven;—but, bye the bye, is he all our father?" "Yes," replied the minister, "he is all our father." "Well, then, you are my brother, if he be all our father, and you have a good shirt on your back, (holding the minister by the wrist of his shirt), and I have none, and if God be all our father, and you my brother, you should give me one of your shirts." The minister left him in the kitchen, drawing inferences from the prayer, and sent the servant girl with a shirt, after a very serious remonstrance with him.

VERY POLITE.

A lady of Cambridge, Mass. that ancient seat of literature, commending the manners of a gentleman of her acquaintance, said, "he is a paragon of politeness," "Parallelogram, madam, you mean," said a wag sitting next to her, "Ah yes, parallelogram I should have said," replied the lady. THE SKETCH-BOOK.

From Flint's Western Monthly Review for January.

COL. PLUG.

A northerner resident in the West sometimes feels his pride wounded, as he finds so few of the first famous "residents" to have been born north of the Hudson. I take pleasure in having it in my power, to redeem one memorable exception from oblivion. Traits of the horse, alligator and snapping turtle are not exclusively western instincts, as I will make appear.

Col. Plugger was born in the county of Rockingham, in New Hampshire, and in a town, where they still call a kitchen a scullery. He had a slight at cards, and a knowing instinct in relation to watches and horses, almost from his babyhood. The boy, who wanted to be unburdened of his coppers, had only to play "hustle," or "pitch-penny" with him. He was supposed to have a reverend dread of mortal hurts, but could "lick" any boy of his size at fourteen. Being a youth of broad red cheeks, muscle and impudence, and withal, abundantly stored with small talk, from eighteen to twenty-one he was a decided favourite with the fair, and had had various love affairs, being reputed remarkably slippery in regard to the grace of perseverance. At twenty-four he had mounted epaulettes, was a militia colonel, had a portentous red nose, and was in bad odour with all honest people. Soon afterwards, he went under lock and key for want of some one who would bail him for twenty dollars. The colonel, on his release, in a huff of unrequited patriotism, discovered, that the people had no taste of merit; and incontinently in his wrath abandoned his country, setting his face towards the western woods, which had just began to be a subject of discussion.

Little is remembered of him on the upper waters of the Ohio; though it appears, that he attempted to "lick" the contractor, who built a flat boat for him at Pittsburgh, because he insisted upon paying the man in rum, and other yankee notions, among which was a promissory slip of paper. Col. Plugger was soon made out to be remarkably "cute" even to a fault; and the people of that sharp dealing town were not unwilling to wash their hands of one, to whom it was both more agreeable, and more familiar, to bite, than be bitten.

Flat boats had begun to descend the Ohio to New Orleans in considerable numbers. But from Louisville to the mouth of the Ohio, was, for the most part, a vast, unpeopled wilderness. At Fort Massac, and thence to the Mississippi, on the north shore of the river, harboured a gang of those detestable villains, whose exploits were of such terrible notoriety in the early history of the navigation, of this beautiful river. Numerous Kentucky broad-horns, generally with whiskey and provisions, and sometimes with cutlery and piece goods, were seen floating down the forests. They were manned by an unique people, tall, athletic, reckless, addicted to strange curses, and little afraid of thunder. Withal they loved a reasonable dram, were fond of playing cards, and were easily parted from their money. These honest fellows were the fowls, that the rogues of Massac and Cash delighted to pluck. They would entice the broad horns to land, and play cards with the crew, and cheat them under the cotton wood shade. They would pilot their boats into a difficult place, or give them such directions from the shore, as would be sure to run them on a snag. Failing that, they would creep, like weasels, into the boats by night, while they were tied up to the willows, and bore a hole, or dig out the caulking in the bottom. When the crew found their boat sinking, these benevolent Cash boys were busily at hand, with their periogues and crafts, to save the floating barrels and boxes. Rightly they named it "plunder" in Kentucky parlance; for they rowed the saved goods up the Cash, and in the deep swamps next day no trace of them was to be seen. If one or two of the crew chanced to straggle away in pursuit of their lost cargo, they scrupled not to knock them in the head, shoot, or dirk them, and give them a nameless grave in the morasses. A volume of narratives of these boat-wrecking scoundrels might be collected. Nor will you ever float by Fort Massac, the House of Nature, or the mouth of Cash, with an old residenter for a companion, without hearing hair-bristling stories of the knavery, cruelty and murders of the villains of Cash.

Col. Plugger floated to these wretches by the attraction of like to like. The faded scarlet and the tarnished yellow of his epaulettes, his red nose, his "cuteness," his strange curses, his utter recklessness stood him instead of initiatory "grips." He was one of them forthwith, in honour and trust; and in a month he was the Napoleon of the desperadoes of Cash. His slang-curses were ultra Kentuckian on a ground of yankee; and he had, says my informant, more of this, "than you could shake a stick at." The fund of his real fighting courage was questionable; but he was improving in that line; and for cunning and cruelty was an incarnate devil. Finding that in that commonwealth, titles were not only not in demand, but matter of envy, he doffed his. To fall in with the laconic and forcible style of his troop, who came over all appellatives by the shortest, he cut down his family name to Plug. Being, says my informant, of a delicate ear, and rich in Booktionary lore, he undoubtedly thus condensed the name of its euphonick compactness. For night and secret work Plug had a fleet of Bucksnotchers with chosen crews, to row up and down the river. Not a warehouse between Louisville and Cash had a lock, for which this gang had not a model key. The enormous bunch of black and rusty keys, shown at Dorfeuille's Museum, as having been found in the Ohio, near the House of Nature, undoubtedly belonged to the banditti of Col. Plug. We have no doubt, that they will hereafter be viewed with suitable reverence, as an antique relic of no mean mystery and importance.

Plug had his episode of love and marriage on this wise. A periogue load of French and Spanish traders were descending from St. Louis to New Madrid, where they resided. They landed on the point, nearly opposite the mouth of Cash, whether for hunting or divertimento, or for what object does not appear. Plug, like his prototype, was roaming up and down, to and fro at the head of his gang. They came upon the camp-fire of the traders, as they had dined, drank their whiskey, and were taking their pipes, and reclining in the shade in paradisaical reverie. These meek citizens cared as little to see Plug, as him of the deep sulphur domicile. They cleared out in their periogue in a twinkling. A damsel of their number had wandered away some distance to gather pawpaws. The party intercepted, and made her prisoner. They found her a giantess in size, of varnished copper complexion, and evidently bearing the blood of at least three races mixed in her veins. But, though deserted by her friends, she neither wept, made verses, or betrayed fear, or surprise, not she. A real cosmopolite,

Her march was o'er the fallen logs,
Her house the forest's shrine.

Her dialect was as fair a compound as Plug's, though not very intelligible to him, being composed, in nearly equal proportions, of south of Europe, Negro and Indian. But love has its own language. She and the Colonel saw, loved, and mutually conquered. The subordinates might envy; but who would contest the claims of Plug to the fair one? The sex and the relation of the quarteron to her husband were designated by the same tact, which cut down Plugger to Plug. She was thereafter known by the name Pluggy.

Five miles up the Cash, on the verge of a vast swamp, surrounded by deep cane brakes, and inextricable tangle, was the log bower of the Arcadians. Some millions of unemployed musketoes kept garrison in the swamp. Bears, wolves and panthers were no strangers there; and moccasin snakes renewed their vernal skins at their leisure. But the inmates, as the Kentucky orator said, "in this sublime state of retracy among the abrogines" had their skins generally too full of the happyfying water of life, to feel, other than an agreeable tickle, the nozzling of the proboscis of musketoe; and had moccasin bitten them, it is a question, if the serpent had not been poisoned, instead of the bitten. Many a load of whiskey and flour, and many a box of piece goods had disappeared in this swamp, through which ran the Cash; and if fame be not egregiously a liar, many a boatman's body was disposed of, unconfined, and in a nameless sepulchre; and here, no doubt, were deposited the avails of Dorfeuille's bunch of keys. Here bandit scenes transpired, which only needed Schiller's painting, to have been as famous, as those of Venice, or Germany. In a few months Pluggy's renown rivalled that of her husband. Her height, fierceness and rough chin, and a kind of long moss at the corners of her upper lip, not unlike mustachios, often raised bantering questioning among the banditti, in their cups, when the leader was absent, if he had not really taken a man, instead of a lady, to the partnership of his abode. In fact, it had become a joke among them to affirm that Pluggy was a man in the dress of a squaw. In due time a little wailer Plug raised a lusty cry in the woods, being, that the poor thing had not taken a musketoe dose, and its skin had not yet acquired the habit of being bitten. Dr. Mitchell and others had not yet raised nice physiological distinctions; and this little one, in the rough cast reasonings of the gang, was deemed proof conclusive in regard to the sex.

Their only domestick broil of publick notoriety occurred some years afterwards. An intercourse, not altogether platonic, was suspected to be in progress between Pluggy and the second in command. The courage of the commander had waxed, by this time, to the sticking point. He called the lieutenant, known by the Sobriquet "Nine-eyes" to the field, or rather swamp of honour. "Dern your soul," said he, "do you think this sort of candlestick-ammer (meaning, perhaps, clandestine amour) will pass?" "If you do, by gosh, I will put it to you, or you shall to me." They measured their ground, like two heroes, and there was no mistake in the affair, which was settled by rifles. Each carried in his flesh a round piece of lead, as a keep sake of the courage and close shooting of the other. Each became cool and even affectionate, admitting honourable satisfaction. "You are grit," said he of Rockingham to Nine-eyes. The other swore "that his captain had departed, like a real Kentuck." A little curly headed Plug attended, as a kind of bottle holder. He was directed to place a bottle of whiskey mid way between them. Each limped, paripassu, to the tune, one, two, three, &c. to the bottle. Over it they drank, embraced, and attested each other's honour. They must lie by in dry dock awhile; but they comforted each other, that they were too well up to these things to be fazed by a little cold lead. It was understood, too, that Nine-eyes had been platonic and Pluggy immaculate; and the historian averreth, that he is of undoubting opinion, that no duel hath been more reciprocally creditable to the parties from that time to this. How many boats they robbed, how many murders committed, or abetted, it were bootless to think of compressing into our limits. The country had begun to settle. An officer, named a Sheriff, began to perambulate the country armed to the teeth, and bearing the sword not in vain. Boats, that stopped near Cash were manned, and armed for resistance. Plug discerning the signs of the times, drew in his horns, mended the exterior of his manners, and saw the necessity of achieving by craft, what he had formerly carried, coup de main. The greatest success of the gang was in the line of gambling; and their main resource in piloting boats into dangerous places, and in general, acting the part of boat-wreckers and moon-cursers. An occasional boat, feebly manned, sometimes fell into their power in a dark and stormy night. It went up the Cash; and in the morning neither plank, nor vestige nor crew was to be found.

Ajax, Achilles and Napoleon had their reverses, and so had Plug. A Kentucky boat had experienced some indignity, and was prepared for revenge, the next autumn. Five or six persons, well armed, landed above, and kept in sight of the boat, as they descended the woods in flank with it. Their hands rowed the boat ashore at the mouth of Cash, where Plug and four associates were waiting, like spiders in ambush for flies. It was a sultry September afternoon, and the weather betokened an evening of storm and thunder. They were courteously invited to land; and were piloted up the Cash for the security of a harbour from the tempest. The three Kentuckians affected simplicity, and proposed a game of cards under the cotton shade. They were scarcely seated, and their money brought forth, before Plug whistled the signal of onset. But he reckoned this time without his host. The concealed reserve sprang to the aid of their friends, and the contest was soon decided. Three of Plug's company were thrown into the river, and at least one was drowned. All evaporated from their captain, as June clouds vanish before the sun. Poor Col. Plug resisted to no purpose. They stripped him to his birth-day suit, and thonged him so, that his arms, per force, embraced a sapling of the size of his body; and, for the rest, they fixed him as immovably, as he had been in the stocks. As his epidermis was toughish, and parchment-like, they faithfully laid on the cowhide to mollify the leather of his back, to facilitate the operations of the musketoes. These little musicians, by a spirit of concert, the secret of which is best known to themselves, issued forth, to the number of at least half a million, each emulous of reposing on some part of his flesh, and tasting his lymphaticks. Not an arable spot of his body, of the size of a musketoe, but bore one; and the industrious little leeches often carried double, and even triple, in the contest for precedence in experimenting his composition. As soon as one sped away with his sack sufficiently red, and distended, a hundred waited for his place. Plug chewed the cud of fancies altogether bitter, and wished himself lapping cream in his native scullery. He derned, and grunted, but could not move a muscle sufficiently to interrupt a single blood letter in his operations. They heeded his curses and writhings as little as a sleeping parishoner in hay time does the fiery "fifteenth" denunciation of his parson.

Poor Pluggy in her lone bower knew, by the failure of the return party, that there was reason to snuff bad omens some where in the gale. She set forth to seek her beloved; one of the young Plugs in breeches and another in petticoats following her steps. She trailed the party; and in half an hour came upon the vanquished one, running the christian race, steadfast and immovable. He embraced the tree, as in the most vehement affection, with his face towards it, and his naked body was one surface of musketoes. She soon decyphered his position. But instead of incontinently cutting him loose, she clasped her hands theatrically, crying out, "Yasu Chree! O mio carissimo sposo, what for, like one dem fool, you hug de tree, and let the marengoes suck up all your sweet-brud!" If Plug cursed her unadvisedly, let it be urged in extenuation, that his spirit was stirred in him, and any thing rather than complacent. Be that determined as it may, he cursed her most unconubially, and bade her "not to let on" any of her jaw, until she had cut him loose.

Plug begat him sons and daughters, and was in a fair way to have defrauded the gallows, and to die peaceably in his bower. But he was caught, eventually in a trap of his own springing. A boat had landed not far above Cash; and the crew were in the woods to shoot turkeys. A Mississippi squall was coming on. To equalize the danger, Plug was in the vacant boat, digging out the caulking at the bottom. While he was yet in the act, and the crew were running from the woods to get on board, the gale struck the boat from the shore, broke the fast, and drove it into the stream, with only Plug on board. The waves from above, lashed to fury, and the leak from below filled the boat, and it sunk. Plug had disengaged a barrel of whiskey, and took to this favourite resource, to enable him to gain the shore. But it rolled him off on one side, and then on the other. Plug drank water instead of whiskey, which he would have preferred. His sins came up in terrible array, and his heart beat quick and pantingly. In short, he found a watery grave. Thus fell the last of the boat wreckers.

MISCELLANY.

MUSTACHIOS.

Although the present is an age when every one writes about every thing, no one has yet had the boldness to take upon himself the task of inditing on the history and the merits of mustachios:—a fearful blank in literature! and one that certainly ought to be filled up without further loss of time.

There can be no doubt that the origin of mustachios is of the very remotest antiquity; nay, that it dates from the days of Adam himself, who, being necessarily without the means of shaving, was naturally in the predicament of wearing mustachios,—"will he, nill he," as Shakspeare hath it,—"whether he would or no. What a glaring error then is it, into which many renowned artists have fallen, in painting Adam without them.

The Greeks and Romans decidedly patronized them. Our name for them is even derived from the Greek. The Romans used to wear either real or false ones; so Ovid tells us that a certain person—

"Procedit densissimus crinibus emptis, Proque suis alios effudit. ore suos."

The Romans were not satisfied merely with wearing common vulgar Roman hair in their wigs and false mustachios, but imported that material from Germany: so, at least, Ovid tells us in some lines beginning,

"Nunc tibi captivos mittit Germania crines," &c.

This wish to obtain German hair, proceeded from their partiality for that colour, which is by the French called blond dore, or Roi de Rome. This colour was, in fact, so much in fashion at that period, that the Emperour Verus sprinkled distilled gold on his hair, whiskers, and mustachios. What a sublime effect upon the influence of the sun's bright rays! My authority for this is Julius Capitolinus; and Elius Lampridius says the same of the Emperour Commodus—

"Capillo semper fucato, et auri ramentis illuminato."

Hear this, all ye possessors of red hair! What a Roman Emperour took such pains to obtain, you will scarcely for the future feel any wish to change.

Wearing false mustachios is dangerous in some countries, since it subjects the wearer to excommunication; that is, unless the act passed to that effect, by the Council of Constantinople, in 692, and afterwards in 1583, confirmed by the provincial Council of Tours, be repealed.

In our own country, the origin of mustachios is very remote; for Cæsar, in the work he published de Bel. Gal. tells us, that, in his time, the Britons shaved the whole of their bodies, except the head and upper lip. Milton also confirms this, saying, "the English then using to let grow, on their upper lip, large mustachios, as did anciently the Britons."

Charlemagne discouraged beards, but excessively patronized large and bushy mustachios, which, in fact, were one of the great distinguishing marks of his soldiers. Beards re-appeared, but being fulminated against by Pope George VII., again gave way to mustachios.

As ignorant people might be too prone to treat the present subject with unbecoming levity, I will present them with an example which, in a few words, will tend to prove the high importance of my theme in a clearer and more expeditious manner, than I could by distributing my own opinions over numberless reams of paper. The primary cause of one of the wars between England and France was this:—Louis VII., King of France, had, in obedience to the vehement representations of Pierre Lombard, Bishop of Paris, shaved off his beard and mustachios. Eleanor, his wife, did not approve of this change, and earnestly begged him to re-establish them; finding, however, all her entreaties unavailing, she gave herself, together with Poitou and Guyenne, to Henry, Duke of Normandy, who soon after ascended the throne of England. I make no comments: the anecdote speaks volumes.

During the reign of Henry VIII. of England, and Francis I. of France, mustachios were in great splendour and favour. During the reigns of Elizabeth and Henry IV., they were worn sticking straight out, and stiffened with wax. About the time of Charles II. and Louis XIV. they were scarcely perceptible, but were, nevertheless, dignified by the appellation of a la royale.

Mustachios, undoubtedly, received a great illustration during the sixteenth century. The Spaniards borrowed money on them; the French swore by them—par ma moustache! and many other common expressions showed the estimation they were held in.

With the Spaniards, mustachios were considered as the characteristic marks of a firm, intrepid, and courageous man: when talking of one of that sort, they say he is hombre di bigoti: a man of mustachios.

"I have the greatest esteem," says an English writer of the sixteenth century, "for a young man who is particular and anxious to have a handsome pair of mustachios, and who looks upon his time as well spent, which he employs in arranging and touching them up. The more he looks at them, the more his soul prepares itself for manly and heroic actions." And this certainly is the case; for what soldier is there who, before a charge, assault, or other daring enterprise, does not carry his hand to his mustachios, if he has any.

"Lorsque la guerre en repos nous arracine,
Je vois toujours nos braves veterans,
Passant la main sur leurs vieilles moustaches."

Mustachios were, however, considered by Granger as a sign of the degradation of the times. He says, "the beard degenerated to mustachios during the reigns of Charles I. and II., and disappeared entirely under James I.; as if its destruction was connected with the fall of the House of Stuart."

For a long period mustachios were not worn by our countrymen. About twenty years back they became the distinguishing mark of Hussars, when that corps was introduced in our army. The Lancers afterwards, on their being organized, wore them; and lastly, the Life Guards, at their earnest and repeated solicitations, were permitted to adopt them.

Mustachios, undoubtedly, give a very fine expression to the countenance; and the wearer of them is admirably described in the following lines of Moore:—

"A fine fallow, sublime, sort of Weller-faced man,
With mustachios that give (what we read of so oft),
The dear Coranir's expression, half savage, half soft,
As hyenas in love may be fancied to look, of
A something between Abelard and old Smother."

Women, there can be no doubt, whatever they may say to the contrary, highly delight in mustachios; and I have myself seen so many instances of the reverse of what Green says in his poem of "The Spleen," that I am quite convinced no one of the fair sex will ever be dans le cas of

"Preferring sense from the lip that's bare
To nonsense thence in whiskered hair."

The poor man, when he wrote these lines, must undoubtedly have been labouring under the venomous effects of jealousy, or disappointed love:—cut out, most probably, in some tender amour, by a gay mustachio'd hussar.

Mustachios form a good thermometer by which to judge of a man's temper and passions. Courtiers, in a mustachio'd sovereign's presence, might easily regulate their conduct by the agitation or tranquillity of his Majesty's hirsute fringe.

"Then curled his very beard with ire," is a line of "The Giaour," and to which Lord Byron has added a note, saying, that the curling of mustachios is a phenomenon not uncommon with angry Mussulman; and to exemplify this, he states, that, in 1809, the Capudan Pacha's mustachios, at a diplomatic audience, were no less lively than a tiger-cat's, to the horror of all the dragomans: the portentous mustachios twisted: they stood erect of their own accord, and were expected every moment to change colour, but at last condescended to subside; which probably saved more heads than they contained hairs.

DUELLING.

Two young men, as we are informed, left one of our publick hotels a few mornings since, armed and equipped alamode, to settle a quarrel in the honourable way. Having reached the spot designated, and adjusted the fearful preliminaries with as much composure as possible, the word was given, and shots exchanged; but their hands were so tremulously untrue to the purpose, that no injury was done. The spasmodick affections which shook the frame soon passed off, and perfect tranquillity would have been restored but for a lingering apprehension that the ball might have passed imperceptibly through some part of the body; indeed so strong was this conviction with one of the parties, says our informant, that the most careful examination with difficulty prevailed to allay his agitations.

Never were cowardice and death brought in closer contact than in a duel. Yet those who settle their contests in this manner will doubtless hold up the pretence of courage. But were there nothing in the affair to excite notice but considerations connected with courage, it would pass by in silent contempt. This noise about courage is a thing got up by the parties concerned; they cry courage, exchange, usually, very harmless shots; a few bravadoes look on, and a few fools applaud: but the community at large, if they know any thing about it, care nothing about it. To be sure, here and there an emotion of pity may be awakened, and here and there the gravity of a muscle disturbed; but so far from considering this affair as a test of courage, we smile at his simplicity who suggests such an idea. Every class of men in the community has too much sense not to understand this trick of mock valor. The farce has been played too often to excite curiosity or surprise. Every scene in the play is familiar as the features of a family cur. The actors play for their own sport, and whether they are behind or before the curtain, is a matter of no consequence.

The men who appeal to mortal weapons in settling their disputes are not generally of that consequence in the world which their blustering vanity leads them to suppose. They no doubt expect by one of these meetings of honor, to fix upon themselves the attention and sympathies of the whole nation. But so far from this, the affair not unfrequently passes without even a dignified animadversion. Here and there a sneer may be cast upon it; but men at large will be pursuing their usual occupations with minds as totally engrossed as though nothing had occurred of greater consequence than a scuffle in the street, or a cock-fight in the barn-yard. To be sure, here and there a newspaper editor, to furnish occasion for a ludicrous remark of his own, or for the sake of exciting a little wonder in the nursery, may tell the farcical tale in his columns. But while he does it he is laughing in his sleeve, as he thinks of the ominous look and solemn tone with which the beldame will rehearse it to her astonished brood.

We cannot conceive of a more direct step from courage to cowardice, from dignity to disgrace, than for one of our public functionaries to descend from the high duties of his station to engage in one of these contemptible affairs. In doing it he virtually acknowledges that he is the crouching, trembling slave of a custom which every man of sense abhors, and he brings himself down to a level with the pugnacious street-brawler, the only difference is that one fights with his fists, and the other with pistols. Nor does the disgrace and misery stop here; he is placing before the youth of his country an example which overthrows every principle of self-respect and moral rectitude—an example which cannot fail to spread infamy and ruin in its course. We hope, for the honor and morality of the nation, a man will never again be allowed to return from one of those shameful conflicts to a station of dignity and trust—a station which he has forfeited by a breach of confidence, and disgraced by an unprovoked exhibition of weakness and depravity.

THE ASCUTNEY.

It was a fine day in August, when accompanied by two young friends, I left the beautiful and flourishing village of Windsor, Vt. and set out to ascend the Ascutney. Such excursions were new to us, and we had not well calculated our time of starting, or the manner in which we should go.

We had already driven a distance of twenty miles, and it was now near noon; we therefore dined at a substantial farm house near the foot of the mountain; not scrupling to sit down with the rustick inhabitants, and doing ample credit to their plain, but wholesome fare, by devouring voraciously the brown bread, potatoes and pork, set before us, and washing down the whole with copious libations of clear and excellent cider. We thus thoughtlessly loaded our stomachs with a burthen of solid food, which, on leaving our horses at the farm, and starting on our upward journey, we found it extremely inconvenient to carry. We set out too in haste, eager to attain the summit of the mountain and look down on the world below. But we had scarce conquered half the steep and winding ascent, when we had reason to apply to our own undertaking the eloquent apostrophe of Beattie,

"Oh! who can tell how hard it is to climb!"—

not indeed the "steep where fame's proud temple shines afar," but a mountain unknown to the muses, and unconsecrated in song, but which, if it had raised its craggy brow on the little peninsula of ancient Greece, would have been the scene of many a poetick transformation, mythological fable—or romantick fiction. We became indeed excessively fatigued, and were glad that a spring of pure and cold water, bubbling up from beneath an old gnarled root, afforded the means for quenching the thirst, which the heat of the day, added to our fatigue, had occasioned—and, at the same time, an excuse for resting from the toil of ascent.

At length, however, after scaling huge precipices, and dragging our wearied limbs up cliffs which reared their rough and bare sides at an angle of 45 degrees to the horizon—we arrived ad summum montem—saw ourselves on a proud elevation, the grand view from which richly repaid the labour of ascent. Beneath us, apparently at our very feet, though really three miles off, was the handsome village of Windsor, with the stern and lofty walls of its gloomy prison, with its cheerful spires, and neat dwellings, and busy streets. On the same side rolled the majestic Connecticut, visible for a long distance, though sometimes hidden by intervening forests, and sometimes winding out of sight to double some bold promontory, or feel its way round a hill that refused to give way to the mighty current of its waters, and said to the genius of the stream, "Seek some other channel, for here I stand immovable, an everlasting hill. Foam not, chafe not thyself against my perennial base, for my solid foundations are not to be moved even by the rush of thy mighty current." To the north was Hanover, N. H. with its handsome square, its then decayed, though, I believe, since rebuilt college buildings, and its classic associations. To the south east was Claremont, N. H. with its little Catholick church, the only one in that part of the country, its octagonal brick meeting-house, its water works, and its rich, cheerful looking farm houses. To the west were the Green mountains, dim and azure coloured by distance, their summits fading into the sky, and scarcely distinguishable from the clouds, with which they mingled. This lofty range skirted the whole western horizon, stretching along from north to south, till its irregular ridge of blue summits melted away from the sight, and was lost in the fields of ether. Around us, on every side, were hills, farms, villages, rivulets and roads—these last drawn, as on a map, dwindled away to the breadth of a thread, and winding a zigzag course, though forest and field, now mounting the hill top, now hidden from view in the valley, now escaping from behind a beetling rock, and now following the course of a glittering stream, which appeared like a serpentine line of silver wire, stretched from house to house in this land of hills.

We had dwelt with delighted eyes on the varied features of this wide landscape, now commenting on the wild form of some distant hill, and now following the double belt of rich intervals which bordered the prince of New England's rivers, and regardless of the approach of the sun to the western horizon, had amused ourselves with rolling huge stones down the perpendicular cliffs of the mountain, and watching them as they rebounded from rock to rock, crushing the dwarf birches in their path, tearing up the slight covering of earth wherever they struck, gathering velocity and momentum as they whirled downward, startling the squirrel, the pigeon and the owl in their course, and finally rumbling away beyond our sight or hearing, to lodge at a vast distance, in some nook at the base of the mountain. We amused ourselves too with building air castles—(and what fitter place!)—with imagining the delights of a summer's residence at this dizzy height, with a choice selection of books, and two or three friends. Here we might certainly give loose to airy contemplations, and elevate our bodies, if not our minds, above the sordid and grovelling world. Bred with these idle occupations, and interested in these wild day dreams, we had not noticed the gathering blackness of the western sky, which on turning in that direction, we found to threaten an immediate, and to us, a terrible tempest. We were not like the philosophers on the Andes, so high as to be above the region of storms, and able to watch the lightnings playing beneath our feet; on the contrary, we knew that we must be enveloped in clouds, and exposed to the terrific fury of the thunder storm. Shelter there was none. There had indeed been a rude but of loose stones, on the very summit, but some mischievous rascal had torn away and destroyed its roof. Here then we were; like kings too elevated for human sympathy or relief, though painfully exposed to human misery. Our only resource was to set out immediately on our downward course. But though we have the authority of the prince of Latin poets for believing descent easy, and ascent hard, we found our descending journey not destitute of labour, nor free from difficulty. A thick impenetrable darkness had gathered over the mountain, and had placed us unwillingly, in one respect, in the same situation as Aeneas when he visited the court of Dido, in nebulæ septi, we groped our way. With the hardy and buoyant spirit of youth, however, we cared little for difficulties, and rather exulted in danger, as calling forth that romantick heroism so often cherished in the breasts of high spirited intellectual young men. We could not, however, suppress an exclamation of horror, when, after descending for some time, arm in arm, and only for variety, flattening our noses against a tree, which it was too dark to see—tumbling over a stone in our path, and plunging to our middle in a pool of the mountain, we saw ourselves by means of a flash of lightning, on the very brink of a precipice, nearly perpendicular, whose height could not be less than thirty feet. One of our number threw himself back at full length on the rock, another returned thanks aloud to that providence, which had thus saved us from immediate destruction, and for myself, I could only lean over the edge of the rock, and with each successive flash of lightning, which had now become almost incessant, steal another glance of horror at the terrific abyss below.

But this was not fated to be the end of our perplexities. We soon found that we had wandered from our path, and all our endeavours to regain it were unsuccessful. Bewildered, dazzled and blinded by the sudden changes from light to darkness, and from darkness to a light painfully intense, we felt our way at every step with much more than the anxious care of the blind, holding on by small trees, and dwarf shrubs, tearing our clothes and skin on the sharp spines of the high blackberry, knocking in pieces our summer shoes on the rocky and uneven surface of the mountain, our limbs ready to fail with fatigue, and our imagination inflamed with terror. At length, however, drenched to the skin, and heartily cursing all rambles for pleasure, we reached the bottom, though on a different side from that by which we ascended, and as the rain had now ceased, easily found our way to a house, where we procured fire to dry our drenched clothing, supper and lodging. Thus terminated the alpine travels of a WAYWARD MAN.

ALBANY:

SATURDAY, JANUARY 23, 1830.

Subscribers to the Record who intend to discontinue their subscription at the expiration of the present volume, are requested to give us information thereof immediately. And those who are in arrears are desired to forward the amount of their bills (which may be ascertained by reference to our conditions) by mail. Notices of discontinuance should always be accompanied by the amounts due, and letters should invariably be post paid.

The present number of the Record closes the third volume. We have not a great deal to say on the subject, though custom does in a manner not only sanction, but render a little egotism necessary. On the past we can reflect, if not with perfect, at least with a tolerable degree of satisfaction, if a gradual and regular increase of our subscription list be any evidence that we have rendered the quid pro quo. We are conscious that we have not done all that we desired to do—and how few are there who can say they have! The most sober calculators will some times be disappointed in their expectations, and we claim no exemption from the fallibility of humanity. It has been our aim to make the Record both useful and interesting to our readers; and the smallness of the number of those who have discontinued their subscription, and the greatness of the number who have added their names to our list, inspires us with the confidence that our errors have generously been regarded as little more than "dust in the balance." Our other avocations have been such through the year as to prevent that close attention to our editorial duties which, at the commencement, we hoped we should be able to bestow upon them. Our selections have, however, always been made with care, and we trust they have not been inferior in interest or utility to those of any other publication of the kind. We have been to much expense to procure foreign periodicals, and in extracting from them we have been governed, not by the shallow pedantry of one sect, nor the effeminate squeamishness of another, but by the healthy and correct tastes, and the wants, of the great mass of the people.

Of the future we can speak with confidence. We shall commence our fourth volume on Saturday next, in an entire new dress, and we intend that hereafter the Record shall be as fair a specimen of typography as any similar publication. By enlarging our pages a little, the type we intend to use will enable us to give our readers a page and a half more reading matter than heretofore—and consequently as much as other quarto publications, and the masonry into the bargain. Our number of foreign periodicals shall be increased, and our selections shall be made carefully. As to ourselves, though we might promise considerable, on as good a foundation as many others do, we shall only say that more of our attention shall be devoted to our editorial duties—and that those who subscribe for the Record shall receive their money's worth.

Our price will be as heretofore, to city subscribers three dollars; to those out of the city, two dollars and fifty cents IN ADVANCE; or three dollars if not paid in advance. We prefer advance payments.

We copy the following article from the Argus of this morning. We have not seen the circular to which it alludes, but have no doubt that the "sublime horror" with which the antis contemplate every appearance of secrecy is placed in bold relief by it. The very sensitive regard professed by the patriots mentioned, for the "liberties of the country," will hereafter be considered quite disinterested, and it will be one of the vilest species of infidelity to entertain a doubt of the purity of their motives, or of their honourable adherence to fair and open dealing. With what a profound consciousness of spotless integrity can the immaculate seven contemplate their own hue and cry of "Beware of Secret Societies."

"The secret proceedings of the Anti-Masons.—We have before us the copy of a circular, signed by Albert H. Tracy, Calvin P. Bailey, Ezra Sheldon, Jr., William H. Maynard, David Russell and John I. Ostrander, five of whom are members of the legislature. The design of the circular is to induce the recipients to attend the antimasonic convention, to be held in this city some time in the coming month; and for this purpose copies have been liberally, but very secretly, circulated through the country.

"It may appear somewhat singular—if inconsistency was an unusual thing from that source—that a party, (for a political party it now avows itself to be) which affects such a horror of secret societies, of midnight meetings, and all that, should have been occupied, nearly every night since the commencement of the session, in secret convocations, in secret contrivances to effect their political and personal purposes, and in secret arrangements for the organization of their party. It is true, report says, that these dark and secret gatherings are not always entirely harmonious. That already a rival spirit of ambition—even in the ranks of this pure and disinterested party—has reared its crest—and that two Richmonds dispute for mastery.

"That attempts will be made, through the means of these clandestine circulars, to gull now and then a republican into the schemes of the projectors, there is no doubt. But the political character of the committee on this occasion, all save one perhaps, being unchanged federalists—and the committees on all occasions—will be a sufficient index to the political character of a contrivance, which, under the guise of anti-masonry, and by the concealment of former delinquencies, seek to elevate those who have fallen, politically, whenever they have been clearly understood."

SUNDAY MAILS. The petitions to congress, praying for the stoppage of Sunday mails, &c. have created a great sensation throughout the country. Our exchange papers from every quarter bring us accounts of meetings that have been held on the subject, and the addresses and resolutions adopted display great ability as well as a sufficient degree of jealousy, on the score of religious freedom. Our own views accord with those of the more liberal party, and it would afford us pleasure to publish some of the addresses and resolutions that have been adopted, did our limits permit it. The following article on this subject, which we take from a late National Intelligencer, merits the attention of the reader.

To the Editors of the National Intelligencer.

Gentlemen:—I will not inquire whether the God Omnipotent, who had only to will and it were done, worked with hands and required rest on the seventh day; it is enough to know that mankind has ordained that on Sunday industry shall be exempt from labour. Denn Swift shrewdly observed, that Sunday ought to be called Sunday, in cities and towns, because men exempted from labour and debarr'd from innocent amusements, resort to tipping houses; and there form associations which terminate in robbery, house breaking and murder; and this the Chaplain of Newgate confirmed, by proving that all criminals brought to the gallows began their career on that holy day. In Roman Catholic countries there are fewer crimes than in Protestant countries, because there is less restraint.

Petitioners to stop the mails on Sunday ought to consider whether men, not usefully employed, would spend their time so well as the carrier of the mail do. Each carrier, moreover, is only occupied a few hours. If he remained idle, or were forced to church, would he do better? All restraints, reluctantly obeyed, are proved to be productive of ill, with furtiveness and crime. The clergy will have crowded churches by heart affecting sermons. When a government of freemen ventures to make coercive laws for religion, it must apprehend that the clergy will become obnoxious to the people. Principia obsta is a wise maxim. Let Congress beware how it commences to establish laws which must be partial, and therefore unjust.

Sunday is the day ordained by Constantine, not that fixed in Moses's history. It is not kept by Jews, &c. Were I to expatiate upon injuries to the community by stopping the mail every seventh day, the philanthropist would be appalled. Are hacks to be employed to carry on passengers, hurrying perhaps to a sick parent, wife, or child? Are all carriages and horses to be stopped, or is this only a beginning of church influence? Surely bigotry cannot be excited to clamour for this, and to feel hostility towards objectors. Is Congress to set a bad precedent? May not State Governments be hereafter applied to prohibit even walking, except to church? When the number of mails shall be counted, and the days lost shall be reckoned fifty-two times in the year, the statesman will weigh the injury against the imagined benefit, and must negative the application.

If we the People have given to our Representatives power to act in religious matters, they may hereafter stop stages, steamboats, packets, and all vehicles moving on land or water. Already alarm is excited, and more enmity than good will. Pope has written a charming eulogium of letters, which

Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,

And wuf a sigh from Indus to the Pole.

Shall the United States be the first to set the example petitioned for?

Yours,

AMICUS.

The following paragraph, which we copy from the Troy Budget of yesterday, relates one of the most blood-thirsty and beastly specimens of anti-masonry that we recollect to have seen. It is a fact that cannot be denied, and of which this extract affords another appalling proof, that anti-masonry is nothing else than a war waged by the brutal and fiendish passions of the wicked, against the better and kindlier feelings of humanity. But such affairs as the one related below should not astonish us so long as those who are half devils and half mad men are the acknowledged organs and "pioneers" of the excitement.

"Anti-Masonic.—We have seldom been more shocked at the horrible exclamations of intemperate zeal, bigotry and hatred, than we were at the relation of certain expressions, which recently fell from a disciple of Southwick, Granger & Co. in Sandlake, in this county. Speaking of masons, he said they were the vilest and most dangerous people in the community, and ought not to be suffered to live. 'If I could have said he the brains of a lot of them mixed with their heart's blood, and cooked, it would be the sweetest meal that I ever eat; I desire no better food.' This, with many similar expressions, were made several times and repeated. We have the words from those who heard him."

At a meeting of the subscribers of the Albany Atheneum, at the Atheneum Hall, Jan. 30, 1836—James Kane was called to the chair, and John W. Cushman appointed secretary.

R. V. De Witt, chairman of a committee of the Albany Library, made a report of the present situation of the Atheneum, and stated that the term of subscription would expire on the first day of February next. He urged the continuance of the institution, as well because of its great utility to the city in a commercial as a literary point of view, &c. De Witt Bloodgood followed, making an appeal to the stockholders, in favour of the continuing the Atheneum, and the necessity of encouraging a literary spirit in a city distinguished for its wealth and enterprise. He glanced at the state of similar institutions in England and our own country, and alluded to the advantages which attach to the pursuit of letter and the cultivation of the arts. Then, on motion of Mr. Bloodgood, it was resolved that it is expedient that the Atheneum be continued.

On motion of Gideon Hawley, after a discussion by C. R. Webster, M. H. Webster, G. Hawley, and Dr. Beek, as the best plan of its continuance, it was resolved, that a committee be appointed to devise ways and means for that purpose.

Charles B. Webster, Charles B. Webb, Edwin Crowell, Walter Clark, Oliver Steel, Alonzo Crittenton, John F. Bacon, Samuel Pruyn, Joseph Henry, Richard M. Meigs, David Wood, Alexander Martin, and James Edwards, were appointed that committee.

Thereupon resolved, that the committee report as soon as practicable and be empowered to call a meeting at such time and place as they shall think fit.

Resolved, that the papers of the city be requested to publish these proceedings.

JAMES KANE, C.A.

JOHN W. CUSHMAN, Sec'y.

The annual meeting of the New York State Temperance Society, was held in the Assembly Chamber on the 19th instant, agreeable to public notice.

The President, Hon. CHANCELLOR WALWORTH, took the chair, and after calling the meeting to order, the Rev. Mr. GREEN, of Albany, addressed the throne of Grace. The President then delivered his annual address.

The minutes of the last meeting being read and approved, the Rev. Mr. AXTEL, Agent of the society, in behalf of himself and the executive committee, delivered a verbal report, accompanied with interesting statements of their operations.

On motion of Mr. MATHER, of the Senate, seconded by Mr. SMITH, of Madison, the following resolution was offered and adopted:—

Resolved, that the report of the executive committee be accepted, and that it be published under their direction.

Both of the above gentleman addressed the meeting in an impressive and eloquent manner.

On motion of S. M. HOPKINS, esq. of Albany, seconded by Mr. MATHER, of the Senate.

Resolved, that the present officers of the Society be re-elected.

COLOMBIA AND MEXICO. It is rumoured here, (and we mention it only as a rumour,) that a plan has been formed by England, France and Spain, for the pacification of Mexico and Colombia, by establishing a royal form of government in the two countries, and sustaining its permanence. The expedition of His Highness Prince William of Wittenburg, who arrived some time since at New Orleans, with the alleged intention of crossing the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean for scientific purposes, is suspected to have a connexion with this plan. It has been announced in some of the European papers, that several thousand stand of arms have been procured in Holland for the invasion of Mexico, and that Don Miguel has agreed to furnish 3000 or 4000 troops as a part of the expedition, in consideration of his being acknowledged by Spain the rightful king of Portugal. It has been pretended, also, that there was a secret understanding between Bolivar and some of the European Courts, which would end in his coronation as King of Colombia.

We confess that many parts of this story seem to us extremely improbable. That Spain contemplates a new expedition for the reconquest of Mexico, is not impossible, nor very improbable; and that Don Miguel should offer to assist in the undertaking, is, considering his character, not among the seven wonders. It may be true, or it may not. But that France, and especially England, will dirty their fingers in the business, is more than we are prepared to believe.

To the Editors of the New Orleans Advertiser.

Having seen in several of the papers of this city, accounts of the arrival at New Orleans of His Highness Prince Paul William of Wittenburg, and of his intention to cross the Rocky Mountains, and proceed to the Pacific Ocean, for scientific purposes, permit me, through the medium of your columns, to propose to His Highness the following queries, viz:—

Did the journey made by your Highness, from Bordeaux to Madrid about a year since, relate to matters of science?

Did your Highness then find, that travelling by pari enabled you to make more advantageously your scientific observations?

Were the frequent audiences, had between your Highness in His Most Catholic Majesty, connected with the promotion of the sciences?

After having taken, and paid your passage, at Bordeaux, for Vera Cruz direct, was you induced to stop at St. Domingo, to extend the sphere of your scientific research?

Did the strict incognito residence, observed by your highness, in New Orleans, originate in scientific motives?

Were your frequent conferences and daily visits to the celebrated general BARRAGAN, who distinguished himself so much recently in Mexico, of a scientific character?

Is there any thing scientific involved in the circumstance of your Highness not having permitted any attention to be made of your arrival at New Orleans until some time after you landed in that city, and until the fate of the ridiculous and Quixotic Spanish expedition against Mexico was fully and finally decided?

Is it true, that, although your Highness was born near a Throne, you are a Philosopher journeying for the sole object of increasing scientific knowledge?

Should this last question be answered in the affirmative? How is it that the Governments of three Great Powers, have offered to your Highness, the command in-chief of an army, for the pacification of the New Republics?

Is this perchance a scientific army?

Do the Eulogies frequently made by your Highness on General Bolivar, and his recent measures, come within the scope of your scientific views?

Does your Highness know the present place of residence in Mexico, of those who, after having made an exhibition of their talents and energy in the Chamber of Peers, have left their country on scientific journeys?

If your Highness is ignorant of these matters, cast a glance towards Padilla! There a severe blow was given to Scientific Travellers, which will long be remembered by successive generations. There the world saw what a people like the Mexicans, who have sworn to be free, can and dare do. They will never suffer themselves to become the patrimony of any person or power.

Thus much, Scientific Prince, for the present. On some future occasion, should it be thought necessary, some other questions may be offered for your Highness's solution, which yet remain with

PILGRIM ANNIVERSARY.

The following Original Song was sung at the celebration, by the New-England Society of Charleston, S. C. of the 200th anniversary of the landing of our Forefathers.

TUNE—Yankee Doodle:

The honest sons of Pilgrim sires,
Where'er their lot is cast, sirs,
Will ne'er forget their childhood's fires,
Nor blush to see the past, sirs.

We ask no nobler pedigree,
Than that which history owns, sirs,
The sons of men who would be free,
In spite of Europe's thrones, sirs.
Old Plymouth's frowning rock bound coast,
For years some twenty scores, sirs,
Has been our chief ancestral boast,
And will forever more, sirs.

For there, when all was desolate,
Save hearts that beat so free, sirs,
Our fathers formed their little State,
And planted freedom's tree, sirs;
That tree whose leaves are healing now,
Nations in sorrow sunk, sirs;
But who would all their virtues know,
Must seek them at the trunk, sirs.

Forever live in memory's trust,
New-England's parent stock, sirs,
Forever sacred be their dust,
Who first trod Plymouth's rock, sirs.

They who, unshrinking met distress,
Amid the desert snows, sirs;
And made a cheerless wilderness
To blossom as the rose, sirs!

And learning there, and piety,
On firm foundations laid, sirs,
And Europe's wave of tyranny,
By pilgrim valour staid, sirs.

Their errors now we will not name,
Though soon the task was done, sirs;
They ne'er can dim their honest fame,
Mere spots upon the sun, sirs.

Let him who doubts their wisdom go,
And view the States they founded;
No matter whether friend, or foe,
We guess he'll be astounded.

Our bretheren of the sunny South,
Our foibles may joke, sirs;
But frankly they will own this truth,
We never wore a yoke, sirs.

And when they laugh at Yankee trade,
We hold retort no sin, sirs;
If we have Wooden Nutmegs made,
We made their Cottin Gin, sirs.

In learning, arts, or arms, we yield
Our Yankee's fame to none, sirs;
For in the Senate, or the Field,
We ne'er lacked tongue or bone, sirs.

Go, search our country's history,
For soldier, tar, or sage, sirs;
New-England's children you may see
Almost on every page, sirs;

Our spangled banner on the main,
Her sons have made respected;
And if by foes assailed again,
Again 'twill be protected.

Perish the son of Yankee seed,
Who would that banner tear, sirs;
And perish all who would not bleed,
Beneath the stripe and star, sirs.

Our fathers, North and South, combined,
And bled in 'seventy-six, sirs,
And each invading foe shall find,
Their blood again will mix, sirs.

In best of families, we know,
Some little strife may rise, sirs;
But who in ours dare strike a blow,
By heaven! the traitor dies, sirs.

Then be our chain of union bright,
The only chain we wear, sirs;
Save that whose golden links unite
And binds us to the Fair, sirs.

THE SONG OF THE CHARIB.

Father, whither art thou gone?
To the mountain's topmost stone?
In the darkness of the mine
Does thy prisoned spirit pine?
Dost thou still thy quiver fling
By the forest's shadowy spring?

Do the rushing buffalo
Hear the clanging of the bow?
Dost thou haunt thy gory ground
Where the shaft thy bosom found—
Where thy sons beheld thee die
With a Charib warrior's eye—
Where thy sons had blood for blood,
Raven's food for raven's food,
Scalp for scalp, and bone for bone,
Till our high revenge was done?

Spirit! whither art thou gone?
To the regions of the noon;
To the valleys of the rose;
To the fountains of repose;
Where the silence sweet is stirred,
But by murmurs of the bird,—
But by echoes of the deep,
Heaving in its golden sleep,—
But by twilight melodies,
Falling from the dewy skies?

Spirit! whither art thou gone?
To the mystick northern zone;
Where the Night's lone majesty
Sits enthroned on earth and sky;
Where, upon th' eternal snow,
Twice ten thousand splendours glow,
Rushing from the height of heaven;
Now, like armies battle-riven,
When the purple streams are fed,
With the freightage of the dead;
When the fight has showered the plain,
With a broad and gory rain;
When, upon the mountain's side,
Stands the remnant of their pride,
With the shattered bow and plume,
Like the spectres of a tomb?

Or the fiery element
Is in sudden beauty blent,
As at some enchanter's call,
Till ascends a glorious hall,
Lit with richer hues than stream
From the sunset's amber gleam;
When upon the dazzled sight
Rush the dwellers of the light,
Stately, silent, splendid, cold,
Seeming council high to hold
On some great celestial war;
While the central polar star,
High above the central camp,
Hangs its pale, eclipsing lamp,
Till the thronging pomps are past,
Swifter than the tempest's blast;
And o'er the earth and sky afar
Burns the undiminished star.

Spirit! whither art thou gone?
Is the thunder cloud thy throne?
List we not thy voice of fear
When the whirlwind rushes near?
Is it thou that bid'st us shake,
When the tempest rides the lake;
When the lightning's blinding glare
Lays the ancient mountains bare!
Are not thine the cries that roll
Terror on the Charib's soul?
Now we see thee in the cloud;
Now thy voice is thunder loud;
Now thou'rt in the lightning's fire;
Comest thou for us, king and sire?

"THERE GO THE SHIPS."

White robed wanderers of the deep,
Whither speeds your trackless way?—
Towards some islet's rocky steep,
Crowded mart, or swelling bay?—
Polar ice, or tropic clime
Where long brooding mystery slept?—
Region whence oblivious Time
Hath the mouldering empire swept?

Bearest thou in thy wind swept car
Wealth, to purchase wealth again?—
Or the elements of war
Thundering o'er the turbid main?—
Hidest thou in thy troubled breast
Hearts with manly vigour warm?—
Courage with his lofty crest,
Venturous beauty's fragile form?—

Heedest thou on thy rapid course
All the dangers of the wave,
Stretching reefs, or breakers hoarse,
Wrecks that strew the watery grave?
Chambers where the mighty sleep,
Powerless as the infant dead,
While the unfathomable deep
O'er them binds its curtain dread?

Gleaming pearls their pillow light,
Coral, bossed with ruby gem,
Builds their mausoleum bright:
What is ocean's wealth to them!
Shouldst thou, when the tempest's wrath
Mingles cloud with surging sea,
Tread that same sepulchral path,
What were all earth's gold to thee?—

Prayer's soft breath thy sails can fill,
Guide thee prosperous on thy way,
Though perchance the pilot's skill
Yield to peril and dismay,—
Though the needle's baffled care
Point not to its destined pole,
Still the God who heareth prayer
Rules the sea, and saves the soul.

Hartford, Ct.

H,

THE BURIAL OF A SAILOR.

They lowered him down from the red cartel,
With her flags at half mast flying,
And the minute gun was the only knell
For him, in his coffin lying.

There was no hue of a funeral pall,
Or funeral bier to cloud him,
The lift of his naval flag was all
Above his breast to shroud him.

The waves tell a hero's course is done,
In a sad hymn faintly crying,
As solemnly to the minute-gun
The oars are quick replying.

Behold him there—as the awful sea,
With its burden dark is heaving,
As Heaven's pure light o'er the sleeper free,
Is a golden glory weaving.

Behold him there—as the measured dip,
And the ocean hears him on,
As solemn all as a mother's lip
On the cheek of her dying son.

They lift him up from the rocking barge,
With a nation's banner round him;
He raised no eye at the deep discharge,
On the stars and stripes that bound him.

But death had stilled that sailor look,
While to the grave they bore him,
As when the smile of his glory shook
His colours proudly o'er him.

And there they laid him—above his grave,
With a prayer's deep felt devotion,
They discharged their guns, and tried to wave
Farewell to the son of the ocean.

And so they left him—and they hurried,
With their eyes turned back, and weeping,
And they tried to think though he was buried,
That he was only sleeping.
